MARKET CONDITIONS.

In many parts of the market buoyancy ruled yesterday. To some extent this was attributable to purchases for the account of investors who are anticipating the extraordinary disbursements which are to be made at New Year's on account of dividends and interests. To a larger extent, however, the course of the market was doubtless due to the covering of short contracts. Speculators who have had bear commitments seem more nervous because of possible developments over the New Year's holiday than do the holders of stocks, and what developed in yesterday's market was to a substantial extent in token of this.

***

Canvass of the banking community results in the disclosure of a general indisposition on the part of authorities to make explicit forecasts either one way or the other. The matter of gold exportation seems much to interfere with current banking opinion. If Europe is so much in need of the yellow metal that there are to be either sharply advanced sterling rates or a premium to be paid for its requirements, we are not unlikely to have some disturbance of sentiment temporarily. Incidentally, the prompt sequel will probably be substantial advances in New York interest rates, such advances as will put funds here at a parity with what they are worth on the other side of the ocean, and this result may, of course, operate promptly and effectively as a brake upon the continuance of gold exportations.

***

In to-day's session of the Stock Exchange expectation centres wholly in horse play. Much variety of vaudeville is planned. Yet the only reason for keeping the Stock Exchange open to-day in the face of a majority vacation vote from members of the Exchange is that influencing events come now so quickly that it is unsafe to have an extra adjournment. And from noon to-day until next Tuesday is a long wait in the face of possibilities that may come over the cable from South Africa. Wall Street counts now enthusiastically upon buoyancy to follow the news of a British victory—counts dolefully upon depression that may attend a further British reverse.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO.

The strength of the Baltimore and Ohio stocks yesterday was the most conspicuous feature of the market, the common stock gaining 5½ points on sales of some 21,000 shares, while the preferred bettered itself 3⅞ points on trading involving about 38,000 shares. A revival of the story of an important trunk line arrangement, in which the Baltimore and Ohio would play a prominent part; a renewal of the talk of a satisfactory declaration of dividend in respect to the stocks; a story that a new buil pool had been formed, and London buying, were the chief factors contributing to the marked advance.

A private dispatch from Philadelphia said that the Norfolk and Western, as well as the Pennsylvania and Chesapeake and Ohio was likely to figure in the Baltimore and Ohio developments.

COTTON CROP MOVEMENT.

	Bales.
Stock, Dec. 31, 1898	88,106
Gross receipts for year	891,235
		979,343
Exported to Great Britain	216,500
Exported to France	32,830
Exported to Continent	249,499
Exported to Japan, &c.	7,724
Forwarded to mills, including sales at New York to same	328,523
Burned	26,848
		850,724
Leaving stock, Dec. 30, 1899		119,619

Transactions in spot cotton, including deliveries upon contract, were 353,333 bales.

The lowest price for middling uplands was 5¼c., on Jan. 3; the highest, 7 13-16c., on Nov. 27.

The lowest price for future deliveries was reached June 29, when July deliveries sold at 5.83c. The highest price was on Nov. 9, when July deliveries sold at 7.74c.

The attention of the cotton trade at home and abroad is directed to the system of grading cotton by the inspection department of the New York Cotton Exchange, whereby all cotton submitted for inspection is thoroughly examined and most carefully classified. The fact that during the past five years 515,859 bales have been inspected and certificated and that the total reclamation thereon was $1,420.25, or less than 3 cents per bale, is the best evidence of the careful manner in which the work is performed.

The grade of all cotton thus inspected and certificated is guaranteed for one year by the inspection fund of the Exchange, aggregating $50,000. As this system is applied to all contract delfveries, the interest of the buyer is thoroughly safeguarded and protected.

MR. SAGE'S ADMISSION.

Yesterday, for the first time since the Standard Gas Company passed its dividend, which was some weeks ago, Russell Sage admitted that the dividend had actually been passed.

Mr. Sage's statement was made following a meeting of the Executive Committee of the company, and was as follows:

"The dividend has been passed, and it is very safe to say that not only will there be no payment this quarter, but that unless assistance is rendered to the situation by the Legislature the period of dividends on the stock is permanently ended. We are not earning the dividends, so why should we pay them?"

A meeting of the Directors of the Consolidated Gas Company was also held yesterday. After the meeting it was announced that nothing but routine business was transacted, and that the question of rates was not discussed.

LOCAL TRACTION STOCKS.

Of the local traction stocks, Metropolitan was yesterday again the most conspicuous for its advance, gaining 2½ points over the final figure of the preceding day. Manhattan rose 1⅜ points, Third Avenue ⅝, and Brooklyn Rapid Transit ¾.

At the office of Flower & Co. the belief was yesterday expressed that the drive at the stock was over.

PACIFIC MAIL BUOYANT.

A report from Washington that the passage of the subsidy bill seemed assured helped Pacific Mail yesterday, with the result that, on buying of less than 6,000 shares, a gain of 2½ points was scored.

NORFOLK'S SHARP ADVANCE.

Norfolk and Western advanced sharply yesterday on the report that it would be a factor in the big railroad deal in which the Pennsylvania and Baltimore and Ohio are generally understood to be associated. The dividend on Norfolk and Western preferred is due in a short time.

TALKING OF DIVIDENDS.

The coal stocks marked material gains yesterday on reports that the earnings of the roads were so large that increased dividends might soon be expected. Delaware and Hudson advanced 1⅞ points, Lackawanna 1, Jersey Central 2¾, and the Reading issues from ⅝ to 2⅛ points.

SOFT-COAL ROADS.

Wheeling and Lake Erie and Hocking Valley were bought by inside interests yesterday. The Street hears it that as a result of an important conference of soft-coal men held in the office of J. P. Morgan & Co. important developments to both Wheeling and Lake Erie and Hocking Valley may shortly be expected.

SUBSTANTIAL GAINS.

Northern Paicfic stocks were strong yesterday, following the publication of the earnings of the road for the third week in December, which marked an increase of over $74,000. For the five months ended Nov. 30 the increase in earnings has been $1,537,400.

BURLINGTON'S DECREASE.

Burlington stock declined yesterday on the publication of the November earnings of the road, which showed a decrease in net earnings of $215,180. This decrease, like St. Paul's, was due not to any falling off in business, but solely to increased expenditures for betterments, operating expenses, &c., amounting to over $300,000.

CONSOLIDATION TALK.

It was reported yesterday that all the principal telephone manufacturers in Chicago except the Western Telephone Company are to meet in this city next week, with the purpose of entering a combination designed to embrace all independents in the country. A canvass of the principal companies in this city failed to throw any light on the proposed movement. At the offices of the New York and New Jersey Telephone Company and the newly organized Telephone, Telegraph and Cable Company of America it was said that nothing was known of any such movement.

EARNINGS STILL INCREASE.

THE COUNTRY'S BUSINESS.

Reports to the commercial agencies for the week tell of continued good business, though in some lines there is a slight natural falling off always noticed at this season of the year.

Bradstreet's notes that holiday quiet and stock taking impart an appearance of dullness to general distributive trade, broken, however, by fair activity in re-order business to fill up stocks depleted by the heaviest holiday trade that has ever been experienced. Anticipation of Spring trade wants has given a more than ordinarily active appearance to business in dry goods at New York, while in industrial lines the efforts of manufacturers to keep up with filled order books is resulting in unusually active operations. Following the flurry in money, stocks, and in some lines of speculative commodities, noted last week, has come, as was expected, a more cheerful tone, and a firming up of quotations is noticed in such staples as cotton, which was affected by last week's money developments, and also in hog products, coffee, copper, tin, and lead. The failure of cotton receipts to increase has been a source of strength in that market, more especially as the break recently is understood to have afforded opportunity for heavy short covering by foreigners. Aside from these features, prices have displayed exceptional firmness, cereals holding up especially well.

***

Dun's notes that the industries are closing the most extraordinary year of their history. Long established branches have undergone a veritable reconstruction, vastly increasing their capacity, while new industries which scarcely existed a year or two ago have enlisted a vast capital, altered modes of business and of production in almost every direction, and improved conditions for the future almost beyond calculation. Electrical developments in light, heat, and power, in making cataracts work, performing wonders in production of materials, and providing transportation all over the land, deserve especial attention. Dun's also declares that the week has been exciting only at Boston, where the failures growing out of speculation and the efforts to re-establish banks and firms suspended have not given the week a holiday character. Yet general business is thoroughly safe and prosperous, and no important firms have failed save some which were individually connected with concerns involved by speculation.

***

Bradstreet's says that in iron and steel seasonable quiet as regards new business is observable, but unabated activity on earlier booked orders is reported. In some cases no shut-down was made for the holidays by mills and furnaces. A production little below 13,700,000 tons of pig iron is anticipated, with all other branches of the same trades reporting similarly heavily increased outputs, and prices, despite the great advance of the year, and doubtless reflecting the large orders ahead, exceptionally firm. A gain in strength of other metals is a feature calling for note this week.

***

Of the same subject Dun's says that the increase in demand for iron and steel products is the great feature of the year. With 415,733 tons unsold and 243,516 produced weekly Jan. 1, hindered by severe weather so that the output March 1 dropped 15,000 tons, but expanding in every month afterward, the industry is now producing about 300,000 tons weekly, and unsold stocks are reduced to 122,923 tons, and yet orders unfilled will require six to nine months' work from most of the establishments. Prices have not changed the past week, though demand for some products improved a little. The average of prices closes 119.5 per cent. higher than Jan. 1 for pig and 102.9 per cent. higher for products.

***

Of trade in particular districts, Bradstreet's says that Chicago reports business in all lines for the year as 25 to 50 per cent. ahead of last year, prices 10 to 15 per cent. higher, and more orders booked for the ensuing year than ever before at this period. Fewer unemployed men are reported at that city than ever before known. Holiday trade at St. Louis was satisfactory, and filling-in orders have been of a good volume this week. Kansas City reports such a large volume of reorders as to indicate that country buyers underbought. Live stock is active, and shipments of mules to South Africa continue very large. Colder weather has helped seasonable goods in the Northwest, particularly at Minneapolis and at St. Paul. With the arrival of heavy snow special activity in lumbering is likely. On the Pacific Coast a reaction from anteholiday retail activity is noted. Trade reports from the South are generally good, Atlanta reporting a specially good past trade, and collections are, as a rule, good in this section. New Orleans expects a heavy business in Spring goods after the turn of the year. At the East dry goods are in good demand at New York, clothing manufacturers are well pleased with the year's results, and building preparations are specially active, although some of this is explained by a coming change in the law. Philadelphia textile manufacturers are busy except in the upholstery line, where a strike still exists. It has been a very good year in lumber, and production is still behind orders. At Boston business is quiet but steady, and the strength of textiles is specially notable. Wool is quiet, with the smallest week's sales noted for months past, but prices are firm and a further advance is talked of after the first of the new year.

***

Industries which depend on individual consumption, Dun's declares, have gained less, though more than population. Consumption of cotton has been larger than ever, with an average advance of 29.5 per cent. in prices of goods, though cotton was for a time 32 per cent. and is now 29 per cent. higher than Jan. 1. Wool has been raised by speculation 35 per cent., but has been very largely consumed, with great demand for goods, which have advanced but 17 per cent. Stocks now held are said to be 157,398,879 pounds. Of boots and shoes the East has shipped 400,000 cases or 9 per cent. more than last year, and 27½ per cent. more than in 1892, but prices have advanced only about 11 per cent. since Jan. 1. In all these products trade shows a continuing strong demand, although quiet in the holiday week.

OUTSIDE SECURITIES.

Much strength showed in the market for outside securities yesterday, and confident buying in several quarters of the market brought about very substantial net gains. Very little disposition is now shown to sell stocks, and whereas a few days ago, stocks were offered down without finding buyers, the record now is that demand for stocks that has something of the urgency of the selling of a few days since is leading to the establishment of prices very considerably above those recorded during the period of last week's heavy liquidation. The ease with which the outside market appears to be recovering from the recently established low prices is an indication that much of the selling of last week, and, in fact, for several weeks past, was due to a more or less unfounded apprehension that the future of the market was very uncertain. Advances yesterday were fairly well distributed over the list, but the day's transactions were not in large amount, as in many cases the advances were made on very few sales.

NEW AMSTERDAM GAS enjoyed further advances in both issues of stock and in the bonds. The feeling is growing that negotiations between the various interests represented in the local gas companies have proceeded far enough to give considerable assurance that before long the war between the local gas companies will be practically settled. It is thought that some mutual arrangement will soon be made, even if formal announcement of settlement is somewhat delayed. New Amsterdam Gas issues were strong in sympathy with Consolidated Gas, and showed a net gain of 1 point in the common stock, of half a point in the preferred, and of half a point in the bonds.

RUBBER GOODS, on what appeared to be inside buying, advanced to 28, and, although some stock appeared in the market after these sales, and brought about a reaction, it closed at 26 bid, a net gain of 1 point. Transactions were in the neighborhood of 500 shares. Bids for the preferred stock were advanced a point, to 77.

AMALGAMATED COPPER was traded in to the extent of only a few hundred shares, but it showed much strength, and made a net gain of a full point. It opened at 73¼, a half point advance over the previous day's closing bid, and closed at the highest for the day, at 75⅜.

For the last two or three days traders have not taken any very active part in the market, and the advances recorded throughout the list have all the appearance of being due to good demand on the part of the public, who have been induced to enter the market because of the low prices which recent liquidation brought about. In many issues that were traded in to the extent of only a hundred shares or two, advances of a point or more were recorded, and there were evidences that some of the stock which was sacrificed during the recent unsettled condition of the market is being taken back at an advance over the figures at which it was sold. The trading yesterday in Standard Oil was said to be largely of this character, persons who sold the stock last year around 655 buying it back now at a ten-point advance. This stock was unusually active yesterday, and the price went from 458 to 470, closing at 470 bid, a net gain of 12 points.

ELECTRIC VEHICLE sold at 65 and closed with a slight net gain, at 63 bid. In the preferred stock a transaction was made at 90, an advance of about 18 points since the last sale of a full lot. Recent sales of small lots have been at about this same figure.

AMERICAN WOOLEN Goods was notably strong, and made a substantial net gain in both issues. Sales of the common stock were made at 21¾, and this issue closed at 21¾ bid, a net gain of 1¾ points. Closing bids for the preferred stock were at 78, and showed a net gain of 1¼ points.

Among the other stocks that were particularly strong was Otis Elevator common, which advanced a point, to 22; Royal Baking Powder preferred, which went from 90 to 92, and Chicago and Alton subscriptions, which made a net gain of 4½ points, closing at 106½ bid.

COURT UPHOLDS ASSESSMENTS.

Justice Smith Dismisses the Proceedings in Two Cases.

Justice Wilmot M. Smith, in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, yesterday dismissed the proceedings brought by stockholders in the Wallabout Bank to review the assessment of their shares of stock. There are 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the par value of $100 each. It was valued for assessment purposes at $114 a share, its market value. It was claimed by the relators that this was an error.

The bank held as part of its personal assets certain stock in the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company and the Evansville and Terre Haute Railroad Company. The attorneys for the stockholders claimed that as this stock was assessed in other places its value should be deducted from the assessable property of the Wallabout Bank before the assessment was fixed. Justice Smith says that he has examined the tax law and does not find this to be the case.

A similar case before Justice Smith was the application of the People's Trust Company to review an assessment on bonds held by the company and assessed at their face value. It was claimed by the trust company that as many of the obligators on the bonds were either insolvent or not worth the full amount of their obligations, the company should be assessed only at the actual value of the bonds. Justice Smith denied the application. He says that as the bonds were secured by mortgages and as there was no allegation that the bonds and mortgages together were not perfect securities for the loans, the Assessors were correct in assessing the bonds at their face value.

BULLS AND BEARS FROLIC

GENUINE KNOCKOUT WITNESSED

Some painter made a reputation for himself by depicting on canvas a deadly combat between a bear and a wild bull, but his reputation was ephemeral, so to speak, in comparison with that gained on the floor of the Stock Exchange yesterday by Charles Knoblauch, J. M. Shaw, William Coster, and H. M. Baruch, the committee appointed to get up the holiday festivities on the floor of the Exchange. They didn't paint the scene on canvas, but they brought together a bull and bear in a twenty-four-foot ring and sent them together at the call of time to box, until a knockout was scored by the bull in the third round.

There were other features of the entertainment, too, that were interesting, and, incidentally, between $250 and $300 was raised for the Lawton fund.

The brokers on the Exchange had prepared a week ago to have a merry time of it on the floor a few days before Christmas, but the big slump in stocks took the mirth out of the hearts of most of them, and, although a fund had been raised, the plan was abandoned for the time. But brokers are happy creatures, after all, and a few days sufficed to put them in good spirits again. Thus yesterday afternoon was selected as the time most fitting for the festivities, and promptly when the Exchange closed for business, the fun began.

It started off like a scene in King Carnival, for the balconies became crowded, the floor a playground for the funmakers, and a big arch of incandescent lights over the rostrum blazed forth with the words: "Welcome, 1900." The Exchange was gayly decorated with Christmas greens. The Seventh Regiment Band burst forth in a lively tune, and then snowscore men in the top gallery sent down showers of colored paper on those below until the Exchange seemed to be in the midst of a heavy but highly colored snowstorm.

It seemed to the spectators in the balcony as if pandemonium had broken loose, but the women seemed to enjoy the scene immensely. Music interspersed all of these frivolities, and presently the eager, excited brokers surrounded the ring for the feature of the afternoon, the glove fight.

"Benny" Williams, the old-time amateur lightweight champion, stepped into the ring, and two colored pugilists followed him. One was "Sam" Bolen, George Dixon's sparring partner, and the other Belfield Walcott, the brother of the redoubtable "Joe" Walcott. The boxers donned their suits—Bolen a bull's hide and Walcott a bearskin—and when they had been gloved, Referee Williams called them to the centre.

They had been told that the brokers are fond of the "real thing" in a pugilistic way, and that shamming would not be permitted, so they went at it hammer and tongs from the start. The bear got the worst of the punishment when time was called in the first round. Matters were evened up a trifle in the second round, when in a hard mix-up at close quarters, which brought out enthusiastic hand claps from the women, Walcott had much the best of it. Time was called during a hot exchange.

Bolen started out in the third round to bring the fight to a close, and he succeeded. He sent a left swing to the bear's jaw that brought him to his knees for nine seconds, but Walcott staggered to his feet again. Another jolt with the left on the jaw sent the bear down again—this time knocked out. He rolled over on the floor, and may have been shamming, but if it was a sham Walcott is a splendid actor. The women, of course, believed they had seen a prearranged knockout, but some of the brokers who know the real article from a long acquaintance with prize-ring methods say they had the "real thing." When the battle was over Herman Hart challenged the winner, but his defi was refused. Thomas Thornton, who weighs 200 pounds, jumped into the ring and offered to go on with Mr. Hart, but weight was in Mr. Thornton's favor, and his challenge was also declined.

While the brokers were making up their minds what to do during a brief break in the programme there descended on their heads from the balcony a shower of bright red rubber balls. They came not alone, for with them was a shower of confetti and bonbons. The members with bald heads were the principal targets for the rubber balls, and when a bald head was struck the ball would bounce away again, only to be caught by one of the hundreds of pairs of outstretched hands and pelted again at the nearest head.

Some one had brought a dozen large felt hats on the floor, and these were used to jam down over some luckless member's head until he could not see, and then when he was well blinded, his hands would be seized from behind and he would be led around the floor to be bufeted from one side of the floor to the other. The spirit of fun was maintained all through, and all those who contributed to it were such mischievous spirits as Hartwick M. Baruch, "Charley" Knoblauch, who roughed it with Roosevelt's men in Cuba; William B. de Haven, Harry Content, Noah Content, Daniel T. Worden, Edward D. Adams, who wanted to do a "buck" dance with any man on the floor; Alfred Mestre, Lawrence Meyers, Talbot J. Taylor, Samuel Campbell, C. H. Eustis, McPherson Kennedy, C. H. Minton, A. B. Boyd, John Goodchild, John B. Dumont, W. B. Coster, Arnold Leo, W. M. Downes, E. A. Mauriac, John Wallace, R. P. Doremus, Ruppert C. King, James A. Taylor, C. L. Andrews, Albert Stern, Edward A. Hough, O. J. Brand, H. C. Oakley, C. L. Jacobus, and several hundred others.

Mr. Knoblauch was selected as auctioneer for three mechanical toys that were to be sold. They were a bull, a bear, and a lamb, and as is usually the case when they are dealt with by the brokers, the lamb was turned away as worthless. He had lost his tail, and no bid was made for him, but all seemed anxious to secure the bear and bull. The bear went to William B. Oliver for $100, and the bull, after spirited bidding by Harry Content and Frank Salisbury, went to the same purchaser for $200. The proceeds of the sale were turned into the Lawton fund.

After the auction sale the band played a cakewalk, and the members all joined in a grotesque march. Then the members adjourned.

DISINHERITED DAUGHTER WON.

Alleged Will Cutting Her Off with $5 Could Not Be Proved.

Frances Belz, who was cut off by the will of her father, William Duckgeischel, who died in 1878, with $5, has succeeded in a suit brought by her in the Supreme Court, and she will now receive one-fourth of his estate, which was considerable. She claimed that the will was burned by her sister Margaretha, and therefore could not be established.

Duckgeischel left a wife, one son, and three daughters. Mrs. Duckgeischel died on Aug. 26, 1892. Margaretha, it was alleged, found her father's will subsequently, and burned it. Mrs. Belz then brought an action for a partition of the estate, asserting that, as the will had been destroyed without having been admitted to probate, her father's property should go to his four children in equal shares.

Her two sisters filed an answer, alleging that the will could be proved and established, and that Mrs. Belz had only been left $5 by the will. The case was sent to George E. Mott, as referee. He decided that the will had been destroyed by Margaretha Duckgeischel, that it could not be established, and that there should be a partition of the estate. The case was pending before Referee Mott for four years.

It was testified to by Margaretha Duckgeischel on the trial that she had burned the will of her father, and she and her other sister, Mary Vetter, swore that they had read the will, and that Mrs. Belz was only to receive $5. A. H. Duckgeischel, their brother, on the other hand, testified that he had read the will, and that he and his three sisters were to divide the estate equally.

The Supreme Court confirmed the referee's report, and Justice Giegerich yesterday granted the final judgment for the partition of the estate.

Loving Cup for Surrogate Varnum.

The attachés of the Surrogate's office yesterday presented to Surrogate Varnum, who retires from office to-day, a loving cup as a testimonial of their regard for him and their regret at his departure. The cup is two and a half feet in height and is of ornate design. Surrogate Varnum will leave to-day for a short vacation at Hot Springs. It is understood that he will resume the practice of the law on his return.

ROYAL MCM
Baking Powder in 1900

The strongest, purest, most efficient and wholesome of leavening agents. Not lowest in price, yet the most economical; in 1900, as in the past, indispensable to the work of the pastry cook.

The New Year brings prosperity almost unsurpassed in the history of the country.

For every one there is money enough to buy that to eat which is pure, sound, good, wholesome.

Why should we use cheap, impure, unhealthful articles of food? There is no economy in them; they endanger the health, they may cost life. There are reported almost daily cases of sickness caused by eating cake, puddings or biscuit made with the cheap, alum baking powders.

In all articles for food buy and use only the best. The good health of the family is of first consideration.

Alum is used in baking powders because it is cheap, costing less than two cents a pound. It is a corrosive poison. Think of feeding it to children! Yet the manufacturers of well-known alum powders are actually denying that they contain alum.

LEGAL NOTES.

RIGHTS OF PRIVATE WATER WORKS COMPANIES.—The Court of Appeals has given another decision—following that in the Skaneateles case—in reference to the rights of private water works companies. The Warsaw Water Works Company sought to restrain the village of Warsaw from interfering with it and preventing its supplying water to the Village Trustees for fire protection, and to its patrons for domestic or power purposes, and from soliciting any of its patrons to take water from the village water works system, and from imposing any discriminating taxes upon the owners of property abutting on the mains of the village water works, until the village should have acquired the company's rights by condemnation proceedings. The Court of Appeals, modifying the judgment of the Appellate Division of the Fourth Department, holds, by Chief Judge Parker, that the act of 1894, which, by authorizing village Water Works Commissioners to lay and assess water rates upon property not using water from the municipal system, disclosed an intent to assist the Water Commissioners in securing customers from the patrons of an existing private water works company, was invalid, and, therefore, not enforceable.

FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH ORDER OF RESTITUTION.—Mary E. Hinman, having disposed of trust moneys, now finds that she must restore them or go to jail. When sued by John Devlin to recover money which he claimed was held by her in trust for him, Mrs. Hinman having refused to permit its withdrawal from the bank, the latter, having been made a party to the action, was permitted to deposit the money with the County Treasurer, as a fund in the hands of the Court, to await the final determination of the case. The defendant having been awarded judgment in her favor on the trial, the funds in the hands of the depositary were delivered to her. The judgment was reversed on appeal, but she failed to comply with the order of restitution thereupon issued, claiming she was not then in possession of the money, or its equivalent in personal property. The Appellate Division of the Second Department held that her disobedience of the order constituted a civil contempt, and that the remedy for its enforcement was by precept of commitment, as for a contempt, and not by striking out her answer. She appealed to the Court of Appeals, claiming there could be no other remedy against her than the concededly remedy by execution. That tribunal has now affirmed the decision below, holding that Mrs. Hinman was punishable as for a contempt by commitment or by striking out her answer, or by both.

***

ENGAGEMENT TO MARRY NO CONSIDERATION FOR A NOTE.—Jacob De Witt, who resided at Kingston, N. Y., and had for some time been engaged to be married to Mrs. Elizabeth R. Bruyn, made and delivered to her on the day he was seized with his last illness, about three years ago, a promissory note signed by him, which stated that it was "for value received." In a suit by John C. Blanshan as administrator of Mrs. Bruyn against Benjamin Russell and another, Mr. De Witt's executors, to recover upon the note, the Court of Appeals has affirmed the judgment of the Appellate Division, Third Department, holding, on the opinion of Presiding Justice Parker, below, that the fact that, at the time the note was executed, the maker was engaged to marry the payee, did not, in the absence of evidence that the engagement was induced by the giving of the note, establish a sufficient consideration to support it. As to the claim that services were rendered for the maker through a period of thirty or forty years, it was held that no legal obligation arose for services rendered as mere friendly acts, although they were of value to the recipient, and although some of them were rendered at his request, but not with any idea on the part of the person rendering them of receiving pay therefor. While the words "for value received" in a note imported consideration, yet, the plaintiff having proved on the trial that the note was made and delivered for a consideration which the law did not recognize as sufficient to sustain the promise, the obligation which rested upon the defendant to overcome the presumption arising from the use of such words was removed.

***

THE STATUTE AGAINST PERPETUITIES.—Maurice Ahern, who died over three years ago, leaving a wife and five children, the latter all minors, gave his residuary estate, real and personal, in trust "until all my children shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years." Then he directed, "upon the said event of the youngest of my children attaining the age of twenty-one years," that the property be sold at auction and distributed. Justice Beach, in Supreme Court, Special Term, gave a decision yesterday declaring the trust provision to be valid. The Court said that if the trust was to exist until all the testator's children should have arrived at the age of twenty-one years it contravened the statute against perpetuities and was void. If, however, its duration was limited to the attainment of majority by the youngest child at testator's death, it was valid, and would terminate at that time, or at the death of the youngest child before it became twenty-one years old. "The testator intended to dispose of his whole estate," Justice Beach said, "and it rests upon the Court to effectuate that intent; and when different interpretations may be given, the one valid, the other void, to adopt the construction which will sustain the provision. The testator seems to have used the terms 'until all of my children shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years' and the arriving at that age of the youngest child as of the same meaning, because he refers to the first by the use of the words 'upon the said event of the youngest of my children attaining the age of twenty-one years,' which expressly limits the trust term. The measured life is clearly that of the youngest child at the testator's death. The trust ends at his reaching majority, or dying before then, and the residuary estate cannot be distributed; and this positive direction cannot be affected by the inapt use in other parts of the instrument of words which have a different signification."

BANK OFFICER SURRENDERS.

After three weeks of wandering, Louis E. Goldsmith, cashier of the Port Jervis National Bank, who is alleged to have plundered that institution to the extent of $54,700 by falsifying the books, walked into the Federal Building yesterday morning accompanied by his lawyer, W. H. Crane of Port Jervis, and surrendered himself to United States Marshal William Henkel. He looked as though he had had a hard time through his travels, being very pale. His left arm was in a sling, which he said was the result of a fall from a wagon two days ago, when he had broken his collar bone. He would give no further particulars of his movements.

The Government detectives are very much annoyed at the way in which the case was handled by the Port Jervis authorities. The alleged theft is said to have been committed on Nov. 14, but Goldsmith remained in town until Dec. 12. A warrant had been issued for his arrest at the instance of Bank Examiner Bryan four days before that, but until that day it had not been placed in the Marshal's hands. The accused man was walking in the street, when it is said the Port Jervis Chief of Police, whom he knew well, met him and said, "You'd better not go away. There's a warrant out for you and a man is coming up here to arrest you."

Goldsmith, as alleged, took this as a hint to do exactly the opposite and immediately left town, and was not seen again by those most anxious to find him until he walked into the Federal Building here yesterday. A constant watch, however, was kept, and all avenues of escape were closely guarded. His surrender was not unexpected, as a stranger went to the Marshal's office a few days ago and said that an acquaintance of his who was "wanted" thought of giving himself up. No names were mentioned, but the man was told that his friend had better do so, as his capture was only a matter of a few days.

Marshal Henkel immediately led the prisoner, who appeared to be about forty-five years old, before Commissioner Alexander. Goldsmith waived examination and was committed to Ludlow Street Jail in default of $10,000 bail to await the action of the Grand Jury.

Goldsmith is well connected in Port Jervis, and it is said his relatives made good the deficiency, at least in part, before Dec. 29, when the bank suspended payment. President Marvin explained that the defalcation was the principal cause of the suspension, as a quiet, steady withdrawal of funds followed the announcement of the robbery.

According to its report to the Controller of the Currency on Dec. 5, the condition of the bank was as follows: Capital stock, $130,000; surplus and profits, $46,511; circulation, $31,500; deposits, $414,391; due to banks, &c., $5,386; borrowed money, $57,806. Total resources, $683,601.

PROSPERITY IN THE SOUTH.

President Merrill Says Money Making Shoves Politics Aside.

Frank B. Merrill, President of the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company, is at the Hoffman House. "Business in our section," he said yesterday, "was never better. Our company never had more to attend to, and the outlook is most satisfactory. There seem to be no idle men in Alabama; if there are any, it is because they are too lazy to work, and you will, I regret to say, find some of that kind in all parts of the world.

"Politics? Bless you, nobody is giving any attention to political matters. They have something better and infinitely more profitable to attend to. They are making money, and helping others to make it."

Remember to-morrow is "Hospital Sunday." It is the last day of the year, the last Sunday of the year, and the last day of the nineteenth century. You can't forget it. Make it a "Red Letter Day" by your church offering.—Adv

BRIDGE AND TUNNEL COST.

Controller Tells Aldermen the Difference in Initial Outlay on Blackwell's Island Projects Is $11,100,000.

Controller Coler yesterday sent to the members of the Board of Aldermen a statement in reply to allegations made recently by Alderman James of Queens in regard to the cost of constructing tunnels. In this statement the Controller said:

"One of the most elementary and important principles of corporate finance is the minimizing of annual fixed charges. This principle applies as much to a municipal corporation as to a railway company or any other private corporation.

Estimated cost of proposed Blackwell's Island bridge		$13,000,000
Estimated cost of tunnel between same points		1,900,000
Difference in initial outlay		$11,100,000
DIFFERENCE IN ANNUAL MAINTENANCE.
Bridge—
Interest on bonds at 3½ per cent.	$422,500
Loss of annual taxes on $6,500,000 real estate required for approaches	105,000
Cost of maintenance	175,000
		$702,500
Tunnel—
Interest on bonds at 3½ per cent.	$61,750
Cost of maintenance	20,000
Difference in annual maintenance		$620,750

Mr. James during the session of the board offered a resolution requesting the Board of Estimate to authorize the issue of bonds to the extent of $1,900,000, "providing any responsible company, individual, or corporation can be found to complete the work of constructing said tunnel for said amount."

This resolution was, after some debate, sent to the Committee on Bridges and Tunnels.

ASSEMBLY READY FOR 1900.

Both branches of the Municipal Assembly will meet at 10 o'clock this morning to clear the calendars of all business which has accumulated during the last two years. According to a resolution adopted by both houses yesterday, the City Hall will be decorated and a band will furnish a musical accompaniment to the proceedings of the lawmakers.

Among the measures that are scheduled to be rushed through are the franchises for the King's Bridge and Fort George and Eleventh Avenue Railroad Companies. The Board of Estimate recently fixed the price to be paid the city by the Metropolitan and Third Avenue Railroad Companies, lessees of the two lines, at 4 per cent. of the gross receipts for the first five years, 6 per cent. for the second five years, 8 per cent. for the third five years, and 10 per cent. for the balance of the continuance of the franchise.

TO COMPLETE SPEEDWAY.

Authorization of Bonds to Furnish Funds for Public Works.

The Council yesterday adopted a resolution authorizing the issue of $905,000 in bonds for the completion of the Harlem River Speedway. Other bonds authorized were: $100,000 for the purchase of a plant for the Street Cleaning Department in Brooklyn, $21,000 for the expenses of the Building Code Commission, $50,000 for borings and preliminary surveys on the proposed tunnel to South Brooklyn, and $300 to defray the expenses incurred in the funeral of Alderman J. D. Ackerman.

Appointments and Salary Changes.

J. Sherman Moulton has been reappointed police court clerk, Daniel P. Sullivan assistant, and Emil Kunzil interpreter, to succeed themselves. The salaries of the first two are $2,000 each and of the last $1,500. The salary of William R. Hill, the new chief engineer of the aqueduct, has been fixed at $8,000. His predecessor got $10,000. The salary of Hermann Blumenthal, clerk to the Aqueduct Commission, has been increased from $1,500 to $1,620.

For Newtown Creek Bridge, $200,000.

The Board of Aldermen yesterday authorized the construction of a bridge over Newtown Creek at Grand Street, Brooklyn, at a cost of $200,000. A resolution appropriating $475,000 for new police stations was defeated.

Work of the Dialect Society.

The annual meeting of the American Dialect Society was held yesterday afternoon in Schermerhorn Hall, Columbia University. It was voted that the Dictionary of College Words and Phrases, which has been in course of preparation under the direction of the society for several years, should be issued early in the new year, and be placed on the market. The original plans did not contemplate a wide circulation.

GEN. ROE'S NEW INSPECTOR.

Major David Banks, Jr., Assigned to Succeed Col. Hoffman.

Major David Banks, Jr., has been assigned from the supernumerary list as Inspector on the staff of Major Gen. Roe to succeed Col. Edward M. Hoffman, appointed Adjutant General. This arrangement will practically leave the position open for Gen. Hoffman to take it again when he lays down the duties of Adjutant General, in the event of his not being reappointed after Gov. Roosevelt's present term. Major Banks will have the rank of Colonel, and, according to the new Military Code, should wear the uniform of that rank.

Col. Banks entered the National Guard as a private in Company K, Seventh Regiment, Dec. 18, 1888, and joined the Twelfth Regiment as Second Lieutenant of Company D, June 9, 1893. He was elected First Lieutenant of Company H, May 14, 1894, and Captain, March 12, 1897. In the Spanish war he served in the One Hundred and Twelfth Regiment as Major.

71ST REGIMENT ELECTIONS.

Two Candidates in the Field for Lieutenant Colonel.

Col. William G. Bates of the Seventy-first Regiment has ordered elections for Lieutenant Colonel and Junior Major Friday evening, Jan. 5. The Committee on Nominations has reported in favor of Capt. W. B. Hazen of Company B for Lieutenant Colonel and Capt. William H. Linson for Major. Both Captains served with the regiment in the Cuban campaign.

It is understood that Capt. J. Hollis Wells of Company F will also be a candidate for Lieutenant Colonel. He was a Major in the battle of San Juan and bore a conspicuous part in the conflict. He is now Senior Captain of the regiment, and his friends are understood to resent his being jumped by a junior and are prepared to make a lively contest in his behalf. The opposition to Capt. Wells is said to be based on his friendship for Major Clinton H. Smith.

COMMANDER DUNCAN RESIGNS.

Head of the First Naval Battalion Leaves the Service.

The resignation of Commander W. Butler Duncan, Jr., of the First Naval Battalion has been forwarded to Gov. Roosevelt. Commander Duncan gives as his reason for leaving the State Naval Service that he is too busy to devote the necessary time to the duties of the office.

The Commander has been a member of the battalion since its organization, in 1891, and was one of the chief movers in its formation. He was graduated from the Naval Academy in the class of '82, and when the First Naval Battalion was organized he was elected commanding officer of the Third Division. He was promoted to command the First Battalion when Commander Jacob W. Miller was made Captain of the force after its organization into a brigade. In the Spanish war Commander Duncan was commissioned a Lieutenant in the volunteer navy, and was assigned to the United States ship Yankee as senior divisional and watch officer. He is one of the foremost yachtsmen of the country, and commanded the Defender last season in the trial races with the Columbia.

The officers of the First Naval Battalion to the number of twenty-seven met aboard their training ship, the New Hampshire, last night and gave a banquet to Commander Duncan. A handsome gold sword was presented to the retiring Commander on behalf of the officers by Lieut. John H. Barnard.

ROBERT BERWICK'S OFFICE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Can you kindly inform me when Robert Berwick was Sheriff of New York County, and the date when he was shot? By so doing you will greatly oblige a constant reader of your paper. JOHN BURHANS.

Robert Berwick was never Sheriff of New York. He was Constable from 1789 to 1796, and appears as Deputy Sheriff in the records of 1797. John Jacob Lansing was then Sheriff, holding the office from 1790 to 1799.

"About sunset last evening, as Mr. Robert Berwick, Deputy Sheriff, was conducting one Young, an English musician, to jail, Young shot him through the body, and he expired immediately."

Mayor to Veto Contract Ordinance.

Mayor Van Wyck, it was announced yesterday, will to-day transmit to the Municipal Assembly his veto of the ordinance adopted last week requiring heads of departments to get the consent of the Municipal Assembly to all contracts for repairs and supplies before such contracts can be consummated. The Mayor's objection to the ordinance is that it would give the Republican minority in the Board of Aldermen almost full control of the city.

Topics of the Times.

What is said to be one of the most authoritative books on the South African question is now coming from the press of Charles Scribner's Sons. It is entitled "Side Lights on South Africa," and is by Mrs. Roy Devereux, who has had most exceptional opportunities for observing both the Boer and British régimes in South Africa. Not only does the author give her independent observations concerning Boer life and character, English life and particular views of the politics of the Transvaal and Cape Colony, but she also presents useful information concerning the dynamite monopoly, railways, industrial conditions, taxes and duties, Cecil Rhodes, the race problem, the problem of police protection, the "South African Shipping Ring," and similar matters. A personal interest may also be attached to the work from the fact that its pages include interviews with President Krüger, President Steyn, Sir Alfred Milner, and Cecil Rhodes, which, in the light of the most recent news from South Africa, will prove most valuable to persons who are making a study of existing things from any point of view.

The Century Magazine in its January number again presents some specimens of color illustration, this time in an article by Dr. Frederick A. Cook, entitled "The New Antarctic Discoveries." Dr. Cook recently frankly wrote concerning some proofs of the pictures that illustrate his article: "The vivid complexity of delicate shades of most scenes is impossible of imitation by the present means, but the success attained by the artist, the engravers, and the printers in these reproductions has been an agreeable surprise to me. The daily touches of color, which serve to relieve the awful monotony and glittering whiteness peculiar to the south polar regions, have been fairly represented." Persons who have followed the development of the color process, even since last Autumn, will very likely be eager to admit that the colored illustrations in the January Century are the most satisfactory of the kind that have yet been produced. The possibilities of color illustrations seem, indeed, infinite. The January Century also contains, among its more notable features, a poem by Rudyard Kipling, "In the Matter of One Compass."

"Shakespeare, the Man," is the title of an elaborate and intimate study of the Avon poet by the eminent historian, Prof. Goldwin Smith, which will be published by the Doubleday & McClure Company about Jan. 25. Lovers of Shakespeare must often have put the questions to themselves: "What sort of a man was Shakespeare—what his attitude toward the ordinary surroundings of human life—toward its mysteries—toward those problems that the ages have tried in vain to solve?" These questions, which are in nowise replied to by the fragmentary biography that has come down to us, have occurred again and again to every intelligent reader of the world's greatest dramatist and poet. In the endeavor to answer them Prof. Goldwin Smith approaches the subject after the thought of years, and with a full and adequate knowledge of the Elizabethan age and its literature. His work is said to be full of sympathetic literary appreciation and insight, and his deductions, while ingenious, are logical. The book is intended not only for the Shakespearean student, but for the ordinary reader. Unless we are greatly mistaken, everybody who has seen "Hamlet" or "Othello" or "Macbeth" will like to read this book.

Albert Lee, author of "The Key to the Holy House," has just completed a new historical romance, which is in active preparation at D. Appleton & Co.'s. It is entitled "The Gentleman Pensioner." Persons who have had the privilege of perusing the advance sheets say that in its style and the intrigues of its characters it suggests "A Gentleman of France." The scene is laid in the early part of the Elizabethan period when the plots of the partisans of Mary Stuart against Queen Elizabeth seemed to be approaching a culmination. The hero of the romance is the Queen's confidential messenger, and his trust involves many thrilling adventures.

The notable series, "Heroes of the Reformation," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, will be extended by the addition of a volume containing the biographies of two men who played very prominent parts in Reformation history, but who were not in the front rank. The first of these is Balthasar Hubmaier, who was the theologian of the Baptist party in Germany and Switzerland. Hubmaier received most contemptuous treatment by the anti-Baptist party, but in no way deserved it, and therefore it is a particular satisfaction to be able to announce that the Rev. Henry C. Vedder, D. D., Professor of Church History in Crozier Theological Seminary, and confessedly one of the ablest men in the Baptist denomination, has consented to write for the series the biography of Hubmaier. It has also been arranged to bring out in the same volume a biography of Faustus Socinus, who was the theologian of the Unitarian party in Reformation times. The author of this biography will be the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Prin-

STOCKTON IN FINE CLOTHES.

The name of this first library edition of Mr. Stockton's books is thus explained in the author's delightfully Stocktonian preface:

About the time these volumes were beginning to form themselves into a company, to march together toward whatever measure of success shall lie before them, I made for myself a new home in the beautiful Valley of the Shenandoah. So as the new manner of life of the books, and the new manner of life of their author began together, it was determined to call this uniform series the "Shenandoah Edition."

The Southern aroma of the edition is further carried out by the magnolia stamped upon the cover, and by the choice of the distinctively Southern story, "The Late Mrs. Mill," to stand at the head of the line. The set is printed by De Vinne, and it is superfluous to say that the result is perfection. Any author must delight to see his family of "grown-up books" so nobly arrayed for their first reunion, which, whenever accomplished, will surely be a thanksgiving festival to him, to his publishers, and to his public; those of his public at least who are happy enough to find themselves in the possessive case. So much for the "outward, visible sign" of the books, but what of their contents, their soul, the "inward spiritual grace" of them?

As we read the publishers' list of the stories to be gathered into these eighteen volumes, we can but marvel, as we have often marveled before, at the amazing fertility and versatility of the mind that has produced them, and we find ourselves lingering over the very titles with an exquisite restrospective enjoyment of all we have read, and an equal anticipative enjoyment of all we have not. We cannot say that in his peculiar humor Mr. Stockton is first and the rest nowhere, because the simple truth is, there are no rest. "In the one class Frank Stockton—in the other class all the other writers."

How his characters troop around us as we think of his books! Surely we know those good people as well as he does himself. In his preface he claims an advantage over us, saying: "My descriptions of my men and women can never be so good as those mental pictures of them which only I can see." Now we are willing to concede a good deal to Mr. Stockton. As Edward Eggleston has said, he certainly possesses a chamber in his mind denied to the rest of the world; but once he lets his characters out of that chamber they are ours. That he should know and love them better than we—impossible! Are not dear Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine our chiefest friends? Do we ever plant an onion bed without thinking of the sailormen? And the deliciously absurd Pomona, and her excellent Jonas, with his remarkable philosophy of malaria, and his heroic surgery applied to poor Pomona's fancies; and good Sarah Block, so sensible in regard to the north pole and "polar rheumatism," and Miss Panney, whose reason for never going to church too many of us share, and those queer rivals on The Merry Chanter, the butcher and Lord Crabstairs—how true it is that "title is bound to get ahead of meat"!—and Stephen Petter not a crank, only because "you can't turn him," especially on the subject of the Rockmores of Germantown, and Captain Timon, "in favor of givin' things a leetle longer chance." How often have we sorrowfully agreed with him that "a good many things in this world would do a sight better than they do if they had a leetle longer chance." We once knew a middle-aged woman who wickedly wrote a composition for her youthful son, and who met swift and sure retribution by having his teacher mark it "Promising!" Then the tragedy of life struck home—the need to us all of a little more time to fulfill our promises. But we have lost ourselves among our delightful and suggestive old friends; and mind and pen are out of breath as they fly from one to the other of the dear people for whom Mr. Stockton dares aver an affection stronger than our own. Why, we even suspect we love some of them better than he does himself—Lanigan Beam, for instance, toward whom we are very soft-hearted, and whom Mr. Stockton pitilessly consigns to a hard fate.

We are so grateful to the man who makes us smile in this sad world that we are apt to ignore in his writings all save their mirth-giving qualities. Some of our humorists have smarted under the unquenchable propensity of the public to laugh in the wrong place. Again and again Mr. Clemens has to insist that he really does not mean to be funny, and Mr. Bangs as a serious writer finds himself in eclipse by his own wit. We cannot say that Mr. Stockton ever needs to call the smiles of his readers to order, but we think our delight in his "character-mongering," our joy in the whimsicality of his fancies, our keen appreciation of his unique and always fascinating trick of making his people behave with absolute coherence and consis-

...Times Saturday Review makes extraordinary return for the expenditure. It is the wonderful holiday book number, with forty pages of literary comment and current art notes. There is a selection of "One Hundred Best Books," with accompanying descriptive reviews, which ought to prove mercifully suggestive to the people who are racking their brains about Christmas presents and do not know what to give. The publishers' advertisements constitute in themselves delightful reading. This, too, in spite of the fact that they are open to the same objection that the old woman made to the dictionary—the subject changes so often.

Plagiarism in Art.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Is not plagiarism in art as much to be condemned as in literature? A recent number of The Ladies' Home Journal contained a full-page picture that in composition and treatment was shamelessly taken from Henri Lerolle's well-known painting of the "Arrival of the Shepherds." I think the artist (I did not see his name) should be called on for some explanation for his act. We are getting in a bad way if we let such things pass without remonstrance.

...Rogers Would Not Sell Him.

—A Springtime Book.

In a strictly limited edition comes as one of the most expensive volumes of the Autumn output, "Pictures of Early New York on Dark Blue Staffordshire Pottery." In the early days of the century, and particularly between 1820 and 1830, it is said that our National prejudice was so strong against anything English that the manufactures of English pottery found it impossible to sell their wares in America, until they decided to try decorating them with American portraits, views, and pictures of historical interest. The originals of these decorations, all of which were faithfully copied, were in many cases contemporary engravings and drawings, comparatively few of which are now procurable. Many engravings and drawings of pictures, views, and historical events, connected with the City and State of New York, having been largely used, as well as many connected with Pennsylvania and New England, and a few Southern and Western pictures as well having thus been used on this Staffordshire pottery—long since dear to the heart of the collector—much valuable pictorial material has thus been preserved which would have otherwise been lost to us.

The author of the book, Mr. R. T. Haines Halsey, has used these views taken from the specimens of old Staffordshire ware to bring out points in our early history, full description of the places and buildings so pictured being given, of many of which very little is generally known. The book, therefore, will have a historical value quite apart from its interest for general readers, as well as being found of great interest and value to all china collectors. How astonished our fathers would be to find the high value now put on ware they thought none too good for daily use in their simple households.

Mr. W. C. Prime, so well known as a writer on ceramics, was one of the first to call attention to this class of pottery, and many a china collector owes a debt of gratitude to the following extract from Mr. Prime's introduction to "The China Hunters' Club," (New York, 1878,) which Mr. Halsey incorporates in his book:

Transfer printing has abundant illustration in old specimens, exhibiting the art in the last century. Later on, as our country began to have a history, the ceramic art began to * * * illustrate in permanent pictures the events of that history. With whatever disdain the collector of Dresden and Sèvres may now look down on the blue printed crockeries of Clews and Wood and Ridgeway, the day will come when ceramic specimens, showing our first steamboats, our first railways, the portraits of our distinguished statesmen, soldiers, and sailors, the opening of our canals, the various events of our wars, and our triumphs in peace, will rank in historical collections with the vases of Greece. * * * Men will say: "These show the tastes, these illustrate the home life of the men and women who were the founders and rulers of the American Republic."

How thoroughly Mr. Prime's prophecy has been fulfilled a record of some of the prices paid for old dark-blue Staffordshire, and the estimation in which it is held at the present day, will best indicate. The book will be found very interesting, even to the general reader, Mr. Halsey rapidly reviewing the evolution of the blue plate from the early days, when, all porcelains being imported from China, the name of that country soon became the generic name for all tableware made by workers in clay.

The Dutch made the first attempts at imitating the dark-blue porcelain which had been used in China since the middle of the fifteenth century; the success of this Delft ware being so great that attempts were made to imitate Dutch pottery in England as early as 1640.

And so the book goes on, tracing the gradual development of the art through the efforts of its various manufacturers, all of which will be found very interesting reading. It is stated on very good authority that the use of the dark flowing blue, which was, like so many other ceramic successes, due entirely to accident, was at first supposed to have ruined the pieces. But it was finally decided to try them on the American market, where their success was instantaneous—so successful, indeed, that fresh orders flowed in, which resulted in steps being taken to perfect such use of deep coloring. The whole account of transfer printing will be found most interesting. It is also a noteworthy fact that the success of pieces with American views soon after led to the use of European subjects in the same manner. The artistic borders which frame the early views of our country are also most artistic, and reflect great credit on the skill of the Staffordshire designers, various blendings of seaweed and sea shells, oak leaves and acorns, roses and scrolls, grapes and vine leaves being very common. "These combinations of fruits and blossoms and the delicate intermingling of the many old-fashioned flowers, add greatly to the attractiveness of this pottery." The reproductions of old views from rare pieces of this old pottery, which form the illustrations to a very beautiful book, add much to its interest.

The volume, a royal octavo of about 340 beautifully printed pages from the Gillies Press, contains 154 reproductions of pottery in blue and three plates in more than one color. The edition consists of 268 copies on hand-made paper and 30 on Japan. The illustrations are beautifully done, the pictures coming out clearly and distinctly, and especially so in the Japan copies. And the

Mr. Mabie's "My Study Fire" Illustrated.

The most charming of all Mr. Mabie's delightful books—"My Study Fires"—unless, indeed, it is equaled by its "Under the Trees," appears at this season in attractive holiday garb. The work of the University Press, the volume is well printed and attractively paged, is on heavy plate paper of a pleasing tone and finish, and has an exceedingly good title page, so far being most satisfactory; but when it comes to the illustrations a quite different feeling is awakened. The pictures—sixty-five in number—are the work of two sisters, Maude and Genevieve Cowles, the results being most uneven. Some of the little fireside studies scattered through the volume are very delicate and satisfactory, as well as many of the landscapes; but the figure work is far less pleasing.

When an attempt is made to illustrate a book which has long been ranked among our favorite volumes, especially if it happens to be a book of essays, the artist has before him an unusually hard task. If the book is a strong, characteristic work, as "My Study Fire" unquestionably is, and one, too, much of whose charm lies in a delicate suggestiveness, we form our own idea of the characters and situations therein described, so that the artist has not only to translate the author, but also to satisfy the reader's preconceived ideas.

In the present volume there is a certain charm about many of the "Rosalind" pictures scattered through its pages; and yet the delicately pretty woman of the frontispiece—the one facing page 4, and "Under Some Spell of Silence"—is far from being the present writer's idea of Rosalind. In our imagination Rosalind stands with an equally sweet, but a far stronger, more intellectual face.

So, also, the full-length picture illustrating Chapter XXXI., "A New Hearth," does not illustrate that chapter at all, inasmuch as there is not the slightest hint of an open fire; the picture indeed showing us an unattractive corner of a very philistine room, the two seated figures without doubt fitting perfectly into their commonplace surroundings, a room which suggests a stove in one of its unseen corners. In fact, it would hardly seem that the low gown in which Rosalind is always pictured properly belongs amid the surroundings shown, except, perhaps, in the frontispiece, and in the most satisfactory presentment in the entire book of the Rosalind who for so long we seem to have counted among our intimate friends, which will be found facing Page 31, "Began the Evening by Reading Aloud."

The chapter on "Christmas Eve" has long been one of our favorite portions of a beautiful book; the whole chapter being so suggestive and so charmingly put. Speaking of the effective Christmas decorations, Mr. Mabie writes:

It pleases me to note the spray of holly that obscures the title of Bacon's solemn and weighty essays, and I get half a page of suggestions for my notebook from the fact that a sprig of mistletoe has fallen on old Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy." * * * When the fire has reached a degree of intensity and magnitude which Rosalind thinks adequate to the occasion, I take down a well-worn volume, which opens of itself at a well worn page. * * * On Christmas Eve it is Alexander Smith's "Dreamthorp" which always seems to lie at my hand, and when I take it up, the well-worn volume falls open at the essay on Christmas.

"Dreamthorp" is one of our own most cherished volumes; an acquaintance first owed to Mr. Mabie's above-quoted eulogy, which has long since grown into intimacy both with that book and the almost equally delightful "Last Leaves," a volume of essays published shortly after Alexander Smith's death, so that we feel inclined to particularly resent the three pictures inspired by "Dreamthorp," and especially the full-page church interior, with its inquisitive old Irishwoman in the foreground. On the other hand, a few of the illustrations are superb. Nothing could be finer, for instance, than the full-page drawing illustrating:

A beautiful and prophetic story told of William Henry Channing. * * * He was a singularly noble boy; graceful in figure, charming in manner, expressive in countenance, sensitive, responsive, and imaginative. One night, after he had fallen alseep, he was suddenly awakened by a noise, and looking out of the window, he saw a splendid star shining full upon him. It fascinated my gaze, he writes, till it became like an angel's eye. It seemed to burn in and penetrate to my inmost being. My little heart beat fast and faster, till I could bear the intolerable blaze no more.

This beautiful story is also told by the picture in a charmingly poetic way. The face of the child is an ideal one, telling the story in every line. Had the other illustrations possessed half the charm and strength of this one, or even if they had equaled the delicacy of the full-page illustration upon page 275, "Like a child let loose from city squares, runs through meadows white with daisies," we would have had a far warmer welcome for the book.

Indeed, the most obvious criticism would seem to be that the illustrators have not taken sufficient interest in the book as a book. These charming essays being eminently bookish, and all woven around a central idea—the study fire—the surrounding pictures should have suggested such atmosphere, whereas, except on the title-page

Mrs. John Drew.*

Unlike most autobiographies, this one contains very little information concerning the private life and personal experiences of the author. There are absolutely no adornments to the style and no appeals to the interest of a curious public. If the readers wish to know the chief facts of a career covering over seventy years of dramatic experience they will find them compressed into fewer than 150 small pages, presented almost without comment and entirely without the garrulity commonly associated with the recollections of a long life, the merest skeleton on which to build the delightful, whimsical, and dignified figure which for nearly twenty years has represented our fixed idea of Mrs. Malaprop.

We learn that she began her life on the stage (as Louisa Lane) at the early age of twelve months, when she assumed the rôle of crying baby and chose to substitute crows of delight for the wails appropriate to the part. The audience and the lights gave her the same pleasure that they never failed to give her in after years. At eight years she played in a little farce called "Twelve Precisely," in which she represented five characters. When she was nine years old she played in "Dr. Pangloss" with the grandfather of Joseph Jefferson. "Think of that great old actor," she says, "playing with a child nine years old!" She was married at sixteen to Henry Blaine Hunt, who was "a very good singer, a nice actor, and a very handsome man of forty." To her subsequent difficulties she makes no allusion, but records in a businesslike way her marriage to Mr. Mossop in 1848, his death in 1849, and her marriage in 1850 to John Drew. Upon this husband she bestows a brief encomium at the close of her memoirs.

"I don't think," she says, "there are many persons surviving him now who remember him well, and he was worth remembering. One of the best actors I ever saw in a long list of the most varied description. Had he lived to be forty-five he would have been a great actor. But too early success was his ruin; it left him nothing to do. Why should he study when he was assured on all sides (except my own) that he was as near perfection as was possible for man to be? So he finished his brief and brilliant career at thirty-four years of age, about the age when men generally study most steadily and aspire most ambitiously."

In 1861 Mrs. Drew became manager of the Arch Street Theatre, in Philadelphia, and did not relinquish the management until 1892, although the later years of the theatre were much less profitable than the early years, when Wallack, Booth, E. L. Davenport, and other shining lights belonged to her company. She was conservative in her customs, and was the last to take up matinées.

In 1880 or 1881 she made her engagement with Mr. Jefferson to travel with him and act Mrs. Malaprop in "The Rivals." After 1892 she moved to New York and began "looking about for something to do at seventy-two years of age."

As in most cases the stage was certainly not a primrose path to financial success with her. When she was thirteen or fourteen she and her mother "jointly received a salary of $16 a week." "I don't know how we lived," she says, "but mother was a splendid manager at that time, a marvelously industrious woman, and we all lived at 'Ma' Lenthe's, at the corner of Bowdoin Square, (Boston,) a gable-end. We had a large room on the second story, a trundle bed which went under the other for the accommodation of little children, a large closet in which we kept a barrel of ale and all our dresses, and passed a very happy two seasons in the enjoyment of that large salary, which we eked out by the three clear half benefits very nicely."

When, some years later, she was engaged as leading lady for the Walnut Street Theatre of Philadelphia, she received a salary of $20 a week, the highest then known there. In those days actresses did not, of course, dress as they do now, and perhaps acted all the better, she reflects.

The reminiscences of well-known actors and actresses for which one naturally looks in a book of this sort dating back to the days of the Kembles are conspicuously absent. Nearly, if not quite, the most exten-

A Hint to Future Ambassadors.

From The Chicago Tribune.

The discussion raised by The New York Times Saturday Review as to the origin of the quotation, "Cleanliness is next to godliness," which Ambassador Choate ascribed to the Bible, has called forth two letters to that paper referring the passage back to the Talmud. The fact seems to have been overlooked by Bartlett in his "Familiar Quotations." It is not altogether strange that the quotation should sometimes be ascribed to the Scriptures, for the volume of Hebrew traditions and commentaries from which it comes is older than some parts of the Bible. It first appears in the "Beraitha" as the last "Mishna" of "Sota," Chapter IX. It is afterward found in other Hebrew works, from one of which that learned rabbi, Dr. Bettelheim, gives the following translation:

Phinehas ben Yair says: "The doctrines of religion are resolved into (or are next to) carefulness; carefulness into vigorousness; vigorousness into guiltlessness; guiltlessness into abstemiousness; abstemiousness into cleanliness; cleanliness into godliness, (or holiness,)" &c. The meaning of the original is that cleanliness is next to (or akin to would perhaps be a closer rendering) godliness or holiness. We have an old Latin rendering of the same, which for many years we took to be the original, until we discovered the earlier authority.

The wise reader will do well to cut this out and paste it upon the flyleaf of his "Familiar Quotations" as a safeguard against displaying his Biblical ignorance when he becomes Ambassador at the Court of St. James's.

They Change the Subject Too Often.

Mrs. Derby in The Columbus (Ohio) Press-Post.

sive description is of Macready, "a dreadful man to act with; you had the pleasant sensation of knowing that you were doing nothing that he wanted you to do; though following strictly his instructions. He would press you down with his hand on your head, and tell you in an undertone to stand up!"

"Mr. Macready," she continues, "was a terribly nervous actor; any little thing which happened unexpectedly irritated him beyond endurance. One night at the Park 'Macbeth' was the play. Mrs. Sloman, an old-fashioned actress, dressed Lady Macbeth in the manner which prevailed in her early life—in black velvet, point lace, and pearl beads. In the murder scene part of Macready's dress caught on the tassels of her pearl girdle; the string broke, the beads fell on the floor, softly with a pretty rhythmic sound distinctly heard through the intense silence of the scene. This so exasperated Mr. Macready that he was almost frantic, until, with the final line of the scene, 'Wake, Duncan, with the knocking. Oh! would that thou couldst!' he threw Mrs. Sloman off the stage, with words which I hope were unheard by the public, and were certainly unfit for publication." This was evidently one of Macready's "impulsive moments," which Browning found "inconsistent with his nobler moods."

Mr. Taylor's biographical notes at the end of the volume include some fac similes of old playbills of the Philadelphia theatres, and the other illustrations are portraits of Mrs. Drew at different stages of her career and of contemporaneous actors and actresses with whom she was associated.

Mgr. Robert Seton, D. D., has prepared a very handsome volume of family history and genealogy under the title of "An Old Family; or, The Setons of Scotland and America." As a piece of fine printing and handsome binding it is admirable, and it will no doubt be a source of great pleasure to the descendants and relatives of the families which it describes. The work is illustrated with a large number of engravings and cuts of the homes and haunts of the different members of the family, both here and in Scotland, as well as portraits of the more distinguished descendants of the house of Seton and its ramifications. Many of these illustrations have been hitherto inaccessible, and their presentation in the present convenient form will be a great delight to all who desire to see the counterfeit presentments of their forefathers. It is now over forty years since Mgr. Seton began to study the past history of his family, and the present volume is the outcome of this employment of his leisure moments.

The family of Seton is Scotch, and is, like many Scotch families, of Norman origin. The earliest member of the family who can be traced was one Picot, or "the pikeman." His date is not precisely fixed, for, of course, the records of Europe were not so carefully preserved then as now. This Picot was connected with the families of Avenal and de Say. The latter name, through the modifications of de Say-tune, de Sey-toune, and de Seton, gives the modern form of Seton. The first de Say appeared in Scotland during the reign of Alexander I., (1107-1124.) His name was Saher de Say, and he was a Norman refugee. From him the Setons in Scotland and America are descended. During the succeeding centuries the family increased and multiplied. Many of its members held important offices and charges under the many rulers which those troublous times imposed upon Scotland. The sixth Lord Seton had a daughter Mary, who was one of the four "Marys," or waiting ladies, of Mary Queen of Scots.

Yestreen the Queen had four Maries,
This night she'll have but three;
There was Mary Seton, and Mary Beton,
And Mary Carmichael and Me."

The "me" of the ballad must have been Mary Livingston, as she was one of the four. A watch in the shape of a skull has been preserved by the Setons as a gift of Queen Mary to her fair attendant, Mary Seton.

The Setons in America are the descendants of that branch of the family known as the Parbroath line. William Seton came to America in 1763 to join his brother-in-law, who was already settled in New York.

The Setons, therefore, although an old family, cannot be called a very old New York family. Of course, in these days it is the fashion to call any family which has been settled here for three generations a "New York family," and, in distinction to the hordes of Europeans who now "leave their country for their country's good," the name has a certain amount of justice. But no member of any of the real New York families will be found to grant the Setons a position among the families of the Province of New York. Although then, comparatively recent arrivals on these shores, the Setons soon took part in the social and political life of the day. Not the least part of their activity has been in connection with the interests of the Roman Catholic Church in America. Seton Hall College in New Jersey, of which the author of the present work is a Trustee, is a memorial of the piety and liberality of the adherents of the Church of Rome.

As we have said, the descendants and connections of the Seton family are to be congratulated in the appearance of this fine volume by one of their number. The writer of it is sincerely proud of his family, a feeling which is usually shared by all persons except those who have no ancestry of which to be proud, for, as Gibbon says: "A lively desire of knowing and recording our ancestors is generally prevalent that it must appear, on the slightest presumption, to proceed from the principle of

THE PHILIPPINES.

F. D. Millet's Account of the Expedition Under Gen. Merritt.*

Another volume in the Harpers series of books on the late war and its results, as viewed by their staff correspondents, describes one of the expeditions to the Philippines. It is by a past master in the school of special correspondence, F. D. Millet, who has acted as a war correspondent in a number of campaigns, notably in the Russo-Turkish, and who on the present occasion acted as the representative of The London Times and Harper's Weekly in the expedition that sailed from San Francisco for the Philippines under the command of Gen. Merritt. Mr. Millet has had a varied experience, and is well fitted to rough it and undergo all the hardships of either a military or naval campaign. On the Newport, which carried Gen. Merritt and staff, and on which the author was accommodated with quarters, were two batteries of the Third Regular Artillery and the Astor Battery. The experiences of some of the greenhorn soldiers in a storm are humorously described. The author visited the lower deck and found the soldiers complaining that their quarters were "the worst ever provided for Christians." Concerning this statement the author says: "Having been in the ranks myself, and also in the steerage, come to that, I had little sympathy with those novices, who so knowingly condemned their quarters, and the record of the voyage, which was remarkable for the excellent health of the men, proved that there was not much wrong with the transports." The trip from San Francisco, with the customary stops, has been so often and so well described that we need not further refer to the uneventful one pictured by Mr. Millet.

About a month before the arrival of Gen. Merritt, Aguinaldo and his friends had established a provisional revolutionary Government. Gen. Merritt, finding that the Spanish prisoners, who were held captives by the Filipinos, were horribly emaciated and weak, ordered them fed. Aguinaldo sent a protest against feeding his prisoners, and had them removed somewhere out of Cavite. From that time it can be said that the misunderstanding with the American forces took definite shape. As an unbiased eye-witness of the conduct of the followers of Aguinaldo, both before and after the siege of Manila, the author was convinced that the great hope of the Filipinos was to capture Manila and loot the city. During the investment of the city by our troops they were not recognized, either as enemies or allies. They participated in an unauthorized way in the assault on the city, but when the American troops secured possession, an order was issued forbidding armed natives within the lines, and this regulation was strictly enforced. Aguinaldo, nevertheless, established strong detachments of his forces in the suburbs of Manila and began to make extraordinary demands, in terms none too polite, on Gen. Merritt. Among these demands were the following: That one-half of all the Spanish property surrendered to the United States Army be delivered to him, and that the palace of Malicanaug and the Archbishop's palace in Malate be turned over to him for his use. He supplemented these demands with high-handed acts, such as levying taxes on all produce entering Manila, collecting license fees, seizing Spaniards, and carrying them away captives. In order to avoid an open rupture with the insurgents, many annoying incidents were passed over without notice, notably the incarceration of a number of Spanish prisoners within our lines under the charge of the insurgents. These unfortunates suffered for lack of food and medical care and died in large numbers. It is almost incredible that this revolting spectacle of starving, dying men could exist within the American lines. The insurgents, unchecked in their aggressiveness, hoisted their flag on all the former Spanish defenses, and even planted it on Corregidor Island, but Admiral Dewey promptly ordered them off and threatened their fleet with extermination if they trespassed on his preserves. Would that our land forces had been commanded by a man as fearless and as quick to act as Dewey. Possibly the conflict with Aguinaldo would have been much briefer if such had been the case.

The assumption of the command by Gen. Otis was, in the estimate of the author, the turning point. He issued an order directing Aguinaldo to evacuate the suburbs of the city. After some parleying this order was reluctantly obeyed, and although the position after the evacuation remained anomalous, the order had been complied with and there was nothing to do but await the result of the Paris conference. At this time, August 1898, Aguinaldo was issuing decrees and proclamations under the assumed title of the so-called "Revolutionary Government of the Philippines." On Sept. 15 the Revolutionary Congress assembled at Malolos and inaugurated the Filipino Republic. The author was present at this ceremony and describes it in a very interesting manner. On Sept. 22 Mr. Millet took passage on the City of Rio de Janeiro for San Francisco. His companions on the voyage were convalescent sick and wounded soldiers. With some of these the vitality was so low that the sea air failed to restore them, and several died before the boat reached its destination.

This volume, while practically only a reprint of newspaper dispatches is worthy of attention as the sooner here pictured should certainly be recorded in some permanent form. It is a narrative of [illegible] a story that will be read with interest [illegible]

A Wonderful Collection in Buffalo—But Not Well Known Even There.

The most wonderful Johnsonian collection in the world is reposing in the fine library rooms of Mr. Robert B. Adam, 448 Delaware Avenue, Buffalo. In referring to it The London Speaker some years ago said that this fact made it appear possible that in thus furbishing up the New World with the relics of the Old Mr. Adam was largely contributing to make it fit for human habitation. It is a question, however, how much contributory negligence exists in Buffalo. I find that very few of those who consider themselves among "the leading citizens" know anything about Mr. Adam's famous collection or suspect that his residence contains sufficient in rare engravings, manuscripts, and letters to establish the fame of any society. Besides his Johnsoniana, his elaborations of various lines of Robert Burns, and the possession of a great deal of Burns correspondence and original manuscripts, warrants me in believing that Mr. Adam has the largest private collection on that subject. He showed me the original of "Tam o' Shanter," with the letter to Burns's friend, Mrs. Dunlop, (of Dunlop House, Stewarton,) which accompanied it, and also the manuscript of the ode to Washington, which has a peculiarly inspiring swing at this time. Mr. Adam is himself a Scotchman, and a very fine type of one, too, with a patriarchal head and beard, and a soft, melodious voice that was extremely captivating when he read these two poems aloud to me. Many of Burns's letters owned by Mr. Adam were printed in Mr. Dunlop's life of the poet, published by Dodd, Mead & Co. in 1897, and so stated in the copyright.

Mr. Adam has also a very valuable collection of engravings and letters of David Garrick that are superbly mounted in large volumes, elaborated from the original edition of Thomas Davies's "Life of Garrick," published by the author in Covent Garden in 1780. And this leads me up to Johnson as I recall from somewhere, his observation to Garrick while visiting him (his famous pupil) at his beautiful residence at Hampton, and having seen and admired the mansion, the grounds, and the temple of Shakespeare. "But, David," said he, "all these fine things make death very terrible!"

None of the engravings or the remarkable painting of Samuel Johnson owned by Mr. Adam in any way verify the conceived notions of the physical man. They exhibit none of the scrofulous marks which were said to be repulsively disfiguring to a large animal-like face, and in only one instance—the engraving by Sir Joshua Reynolds, published in 1770 by James Watson, a profile view—is the half blind and distorted eye shown. Even in this the head is of enormous strength in its mental indication, and does not exhibit any of the abominable characteristics which nearly every one who has read anything about Samuel Johnson at all has formed in fancy of the man—particularly from that knowledge disseminated by the encyclopaedia. This portrait, however, is strangely intrusive by the hands forced in peculiar juxtaposition as if in endeavor by the artist to show their nervous muscular twitching. Johnson, himself, did not like the work, and exclaimed that no one had a right to picture the infirmity of friends. It is the only portrait showing Johnson without a wig. Other engravings are, one from the painting by Opie, engraved by Townley, published in 1792; from the painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds, engraved by William Doughty in 1795, and the portrait by Reynolds, engraved by John Jones.

Mr. Adam has in conspicuous position the celebrated painting by Miss Reynolds, (1783,) which Johnson refers to in a letter to Mrs. Thrale, saying he sat with the patience such as mortal is born to bear eleven or twelve times, and characterized it as "Johnson's Grimly Ghost."

Among the books and pamphlets in Mr. Adam's collection, a copy of "The Rambler," published in 1752, and presented to Mrs. Gastrel, an old friend who lived in Litchfield, contains this autograph inscription:

To Mrs. Gastrel, in memory of a long friendship and in acknowledgment of many favors, these volumes are presented by her most obedient and most humble servant the author.

"Irene," as acted at Drury Lane, the first copy; a rare pamphlet entitled "Marmor Norfolciense," by "Probus Britannicus," published in 1739, in London, by J. Brett, and an address written in behalf of the Rev. Dr. William Dodd, entitled "The Convict's Address to His Unhappy Brethren." This was a plea to save Dodd from punishment for the forgery of the name of the Earl of Chesterfield, but was unsuccessful. It will be remembered that the Earl was one of the first friends of Johnson's, but deserted him when the eccentric writer was most in need of him. Subsequently, however, the Earl, regretting his own conduct, hastened to amend it by printing a most skillful and extravagant "puff" in The World, advertising the production of Johnson's dictionary, which it was expected would be dedicated to the Earl. Johnson's resentment, however, was not so appeased. Mr. Adam has a copy of the original edition, (beautifully printed in what is now called "bourgeois old style,") and it is indeed a literary curiosity in its references and quotations. It may not be uninteresting here to quote four definitions:

OATS—A grain which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports people.

PATRON—One who countenances, supports, or protects. Commonly a wretch qualities and attributes not by the common values of property, but wrestles alone by those to whom excise is paid.

Although the dictionary added greatly to Johnson's fame and excited much amusing criticism, he was only paid something like 1,500 guineas for his tremendous work—none of which he owned at the time of its completion. He had been distressingly "hard up" during the last three years of its preparation, and his publishers were more or less parsimonious, and he was often "goaded to dispatch for copy" when he was most hungry. Mr. Adam possesses the letter that Johnson wrote to his literary jailers on such an occasion. It was addressed to Mr. Strahan, one of the firm. He had been apparently threatened with a "blockade" in the matter of money raising, but Johnson was master of the situation, for if he threw up his work the loss would fall upon them heavily. Therefore he must have money by the evening of the next day, or he would quit work!

Nov. 1, 1751.

To William Strahan:

Dearest Sir: The message which you sent me by Mr. Stuart I do not consider as at all your own, but if you were contented to be the deliverer of it to me, you must favor me so far as to return my answer, which I have written down to spare you the unpleasing office of doing it in your own words. You advise me to write, I know, with very kind intentions, nor do I intend to treat your counsel with any disregard when I declare that in the present state of the matter "I shall not write"—otherwise than the words following:

"That my resolution has long been and is not now altered, and is now less likely to be altered, that I shall not see the Gentlemen Partners till the first volume is in the press, which they may forward or retard by dispensing or not dispensing with the last message."

Be pleased to lay this my determination before them this morning, for I shall think of taking my measures accordingly to-morrow evening, only this, that I mean no harm, but that my citadel shall not be taken by storm while I can defend it, and that if a blockade is intended the country is under the command of my batteries. I shall think of laying it under contribution to-morrow evening. I am, Sir, your most obliged, most obedient, and most humble servant,

SAM: JOHNSON.

Mr. Adam has the original copies of "The Tavern" and "The Deserted Village," by Goldsmith, from Boswell's library, showing his notation that the last four lines of the last-named poem were written by Johnson; also the proofsheets of the "Life of Pope," which were given by Johnson to Fanny Burney; also copies of the first editions of Johnson's "Life of Mr. Richard Savage," (1734,) and never reprinted; "Prince of Abyssinia," in two volumes, published by R. & J. Doddesley, Pall Mall, 1749; first editions of his famous "London," 1738, and "The Van of Human Wishes," 1749, published by Doddesley.

Perhaps the most interesting treasures in the collection are the two volumes of the proofsheets complete of Boswell's "Life of Johnson," (1791,) from Boswell's own library. The notations and corrections on most every page are extremely interesting. Frequent mention is made of the fact that "Mr. Self has read this proof carefully," &c. Mr. Self was apparently the gentleman who had the critical charge of the printing. On one page in Vol. II. occurs this sentence: "But I think 'in aversion from entails.'" This is queried on the margin as to use of the word 'from,' but Boswell "O. K.'s" the original by saying, "This is right, as in Johnson's letters 'averse from' is legitimate language." In the second edition of the "Life," Page 136, Vol. II., will be found reference to assistance from James Abercrombie, Esq., of Philadelphia. Mr. Adam has a copy of this volume, which was sent to Mr. Abercrombie with this inscription: "From his much obliged humble servant, the author," (1793.)

A copy of "Johnsoniana," published by Murray in 1836, (I think it was Murray who wrote the Johnson article in the Encyclopaedia Brittanica,) has been extended to two large volumes by the insertion of many portraits, views, and autograph letters. A copy of Johnson's "The Government of the Tongue," (1693,) bears this inscription by James Boswell:

London, 1779.

Presented to me by my worthy friend Bennett Langton, Esq., of London, as a Book by which I might be much improved, viz., by the Government of Tongue. He gave me the book and hoped I would read that treatise; but said no more. I have expressed in words what I believe was his meaning. It was delicate admonition.

Another letter of Johnson's, written to Mrs. Thrale, in the possession of Mr. Adam, is quite illustrative of the opposite side of his character, and is written with that charm of directness, ease, vigor, and sense that made him such a delightful talker. It is well worth while to print it here:

To Mrs. Thrale:

Dear Madam: Since you have written to me with the attention and tenderness of ancient times, your letters give me a great part of the pleasure which a life of solitude admits. You will never bestow any share of your good will on one who deserves better. Those that have loved longest love best. A sudden blaze of kindness may by a single blast of coldness be extinguished, but that fondness which length of time has connected with [sic] many circumstances and occasions, though it may for awhile be suppressed by disgust or resentment, with or without cause, is hourly revived by accidental recollection. To those that have lived long together everything heard and everything seen recall some pleasure communicated or some benefit conferred, some petty quarrel, or some slight endearment. Esteem of great powers or amiable qualities newly discovered may embroider a day or a week, but a friendship of twenty years is interwoven with the texture of life. A friend may be often found and lost, but an old friend never can be found, and nature has provided that he cannot easily be lost. * * * As we daily see our friends die around us, we that are left must cling closer, and, if we can do nothing more, at least pray for one another; and remember, that as others die, we must die too, and prepare ourselves diligently for the last great trial. I am, Madam, your affectionately,

SAM JOHNSON.

It will be remembered by those who know the life of Johnson that Mrs. Thrale was the wife of a rich brewer who took Johnson

The Settlement of Germantown.*

Hendrick Pannebecker, Graeff, Paul Kuster, Conred, Sellen, Umstat, Rittenhouse—these are names well known in Pennsylvania, and they belonged to the men who settled Germantown. The Hon. Samuel Whittaker Pennypacker, Senior Vice President of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, in his volume "The Settlement of Germantown," presents material of the most valuable and interesting character. The work shows how many were the difficulties, and how thoroughly they have been overcome. Research has been carried out in all directions, at home and abroad. Old and rare volumes and documents have been collected all throwing light on the subject.

The settlement of Germantown in 1683 is of prime importance, for it was "the first step in the great movement of people from the region bordering on the historic and beautiful Rhine." At the beginning it was from Crefeld that came the early exodus. This city is well known to-day for its manufacturing interests. It is situated on the Lower Rhine, not far from the borders of Holland. Either in 1678 or a year or so later, one Jacob Telner came to the American Colonies. Telner was a Crefeld man who carried on business in Amsterdam. On the 10th of March, 1682, William Penn conveyed to Telner, Jan Steypers, and to Dirck Sipman of Crefeld, 5,000 acres of land, to be laid out in Pennsylvania. The author shows that the purchase was made, not for speculation but for colonization. This movement, like many others of that time, was due in great measure to religious intolerance. Mr. Pennypacker follows closely the religious troubles of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was the Dutch reformer Menno, who, far in advance of his time, taught the complete severance between Church and State. From the Mennonites sprang the general Baptist churches in England. John Fox, the founder of the Quakers, "imbibed his faith" in no small part from Menno. There was spiritual relationship between Quaker and Mennonite. It is reasonable to suppose that William Penn invited the Mennonites to Pennsylvania. Roosen writes "upon an invitation to our distressed forefathers in the faith, it is said, a number of them emigrated either from Holland or the Palatine and settled in Germantown in 1683, and there established the first church in America."

William Penn, Stubbs, and other Friends had visited Holland and Germany and had been most kindly received by the Mennonites. The founder of Philadelphia must have been familiar with the fine traits of these Germans. At Crefeld then there was preparation made for departure. It so happened that when Telner went to England he met there a Quaker friend, a Londoner, with whom he had done business. Claypole, the Quaker, was about starting out for Pennsylvania. An arrangement was made, and the entire party took the same ship. The author shows that it is highly probable that all the Crefelders were related. The pioneers arrived in Philadelphia without mishap on the 8th of October 1683. Now appears Francis Daniel Pastorius. He is to be honored as the foster father of the Germans in North America. Pastorius was born at Flomborn in 1674. "He came as a young man to Germantown, where in 1699 he married Eve, the daughter of Hans Peter Umstat. He was a man of education, writing a dainty script, possessing a knowledge of the Dutch, German, and English languages, and of mathematics." Pastorius served Penn as a surveyor. About a year before the coming of the Crefelders Pastorius had settled in Philadelphia, where he had built a small house. Many of the people were then living in caves. Pastorius seems to have exerted himself in behalf of the new arrivals. He parceled out the land for them. He, in fact, cast his lot with them. The new-comers dug cellars and built huts. Then commenced the settlement of Germantown. There is a German pun of the period worthy of preservation. Some one called Germantown "Armentown," on account of the poverty of the new-comers. There was another settlement attempted by the Frankford company, but this came to nothing, owing to the indifferent quality of the people.

The author takes a just pride in his forefathers. Many details are given of the professions and trades of the Germantown settlers. The paper mill built by Rittenhouse was among the first in the country. This mill is associated with William Bradford, the printer. Here is a picture of "Germopolis," or Germantown of 216 years ago. Joris Wertmuler writes home to his brother in fruits. All kinds of corn are sown. From a bushel of wheat it is said you may get sixty or seventy, as good is the land. You can keep as many cattle as you wish, and there is provender enough for them, and as many swine as you want, since there are multitudes of oak trees, which produce an abundance of acorns to make them fat, and other wild nuts. You find here householders who have a hundred cows and innumerable hogs, so that a man can have as much pork as he wants. There are all kinds of wild animals, such as deer, roes, etc.; all kinds of birds, some tame and others wild, by the thousand together with an exceptionally great quantity of fish. The land lies in a very good climate, and is very healthy. You seldom see fogs or mists. There are many great and small rivers that are navigable, beautiful springs, fountains, and valleys. The farmers or husbandmen live better than lords."

*THE SETTLEMENT OF GERMANTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA, AND THE BEGINNING OF GERMAN EMIGRATION TO NORTH AMERICA. By the Hon. Samuel Whitaker Pennypacker, LL. D., President of the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, and Senior Vice President of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: William J. Campbell.

Long ago Germantown lost its rustic character. That pretty lane to which Margaretha Fisher gave her name may have brick sidewalks now, and rows of houses flanking both sides of it. "Where are the springs of long ago?"

The make up of the volume is excellent. Here are fac similes of title pages of rare books, old letters, autographs, all having to do with the long past. The author shows himself to have been the keenest of collectors, with a definite purpose.

To Cheapen Postage on Library Books.

An effort is being made by the New England Educational League to cheapen book postage—that is, a lessening of the rates on books sent from public or incorporated libraries, so as to furnish a cheap delivery or carrier service. What is asked is to secure second postage rates, 1 cent a pound on books sent through the mails, coming from public libraries. From The People of Cambridge, Mass., the following is taken:

In the progress of the movement correspondence has been carried on with more than two hundred prominent persons in the United States and other countries, from whom valuable suggestions have been received. The objection that a deficit in second-class matter is chronic is met by the statements that the natural zone of library circulation, a radius of one to one hundred miles or less, would be economic and, perhaps, profitable to the postal system; also, by recent postal reforms the postal system is self-sustaining except for free mail matter.

Many letters have been received by those at the head of the movement, favoring a cheaper rate of postage on such books as are sent by libraries, and among the writers are Postmasters and Congressmen. The Library Association of the Western and Pacific States believe that such reduction of postage will add much to public education. In Switzerland the rate of postage on books has been made very cheap, some 3 cents on four pounds, and for that sum books may be sent and returned.

Those interested in this movement and wishing further information will address members of the council represented by Miss F. E. Whitcher, Public Library, Manchester, N. H.; H. C. Wellman, Public Library, Brookline, Mass.; E. H. Clement, Boston, Mass.; Miss C. M. Hewins, Public Library, Hartford, Conn.; G. F. Bowerman, New York Tribune; J. H. Quaritch and the Golden Rule.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In the two full and interesting notices on Bernard Quaritch's wonderful career, no mention is made of one of his most remarkable gifts, viz., integrity, honesty. The following incidents may be of interest to book dealers, both here and abroad: I hunted all over London to get a work by a famous author, out of print this last century. Nobody had heard of the work, never knew the author had written such. I pointed out that I had seen it in the British Museum. As a last resort I turned in to Quaritch. They said the same thing. After a talk, I left an order to get it, as I sailed for home the next day. I gave the address of a book club in New York, and offered a deposit. They replied, "Club members were guarantee enough for them." They asked me to name a limit, which was put at £2 10s. The book arrived with a bill for 5s., a difference of $11, there being no earthly reason why the full limit should not be charged. They knew I could not get it elsewhere, especially in America.

I mentioned this small incident to a well-known dealer here. He replied, "That is the secret of his great success. Everybody found him perfectly honest. I have since had larger transactions, with the same result."

Another instance: On receiving numerous catalogues from Europe regularly, I pick out books I want, send the money. In two instances I received from London a post card, saying the books were sold previous to my order; that the money would be credited to my account. After that no catalogues were sent. I now buy on the dry goods plan—cash on delivery.

There is no doubt books can be bought cheaper abroad than here. I have tried it often, though no duty is paid on works published more than twenty years. Not the slightest reflections are intended to either our or the London booksellers, but Quaritch seemed to make the golden rule pay, and it would be interesting to know if others have experienced the same. LOUIS RHEAD.

EAST TENNESSEE.

Her Part in the Civil War.*

When the civil war broke out the people of the North were rejoiced at the stand for the Union taken by many of the people of Tennessee. Particularly was that true of East Tennessee, which was the home of descendants of North Carolina and Virginia settlers whose families had been slave owners from colonial days. Notwithstanding that the fires of abolition had burned brightly in East Tennessee for years, and the Union had many devoted adherents, the people of the North were fearful that the strong secession feeling of South Carolina would prove contagious and sweep over the doubtful States, drowning out all support of the Union in those sections. The author of the present volume, Judge Oliver P. Temple, was a slaveholder and in sympathy with the peculiar institutions of the South. On the other hand, an abiding faith in and affection for the Union led him to cast his lot with those who remained loyal to the flag. That this loyalty brought down on their heads the wrath and vengeance of the Confederates is a fact which history amply verifies. It is difficult for those who did not live in those turbulent times to appreciate the bitterness of feeling which prevailed between the factions. The loyal Tennesseeans were called "Tennessee Tories" by their neighbors who sided with the South. When they subsequently met, in single combat, in scouting parties, or in battle, it was often a duel to the death. The author's aim in preparing the present volume was to rescue from oblivion many valuable historical facts connected with that momentous period of strife, and to indicate, if such a thing is necessary, the conduct of the people of East Tennessee in separating from their friends and kindred in the South and adhering to the National Government. The importance of Tennessee remaining loyal to the Union cannot be overestimated. The constancy and heroic sacrifices of those loyal mountaineers are graphically portrayed by the author, and furnish a record of patriotic devotion unsurpassed in our National annals.

In the three opening chapters the author outlines the settlement of East Tennessee, the perilous experiences of the patriots in the days of the Revolution, and the events attending the creation of the State, and the development under the Constitution of 1796. Slavery as an institution was coexistent with the settling of the territory. As early as 1815 a manumission society was organized, and from that time on efforts to free the slaves never ceased. It is a fact not generally known that the first genuine emancipation paper in the United States was published at Jonesborough, in the mountains of East Tennessee, in 1819, by Elisha Embree a Quaker. Many of the people were aroused on the subject and numerous slaves were emancipated.

So numerous did the free colored people become that the Legislature of 1831 passed an act forbidding emancipation except upon the conditions that those emancipated immediately leave the State.

The Whig National Convention at Baltimore in May, 1860, nominated John Bell of Tennessee for President upon a platform which embodied the idea, "The Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws." Gustavus A. Henry of Tennessee addressed the convention in behalf of his State and the nominee, and in a grand climax of oratory disclosed his willingness to die for the Union. Yet within eighteen months from that time Henry had become a Confederate Senator from Tennessee, and Bell had announced his adhesion to the Southern cause. Gov. Harris and others holding extreme views tried to force the State into immediately adopting an ordinance of secession. East Tennessee, under the leadership of William G. Brownlow, Andrew Johnson, Horace Maynard, Thomas A. R. Nelson, John Baxter, John M. Fleming, Samuel R. Rodgers, the author, and other zealous patriots, remained loyal to the Union, and when the question of holding a convention for the purpose of seceding was submitted, the loyal people of that section of Tennessee twice overwhelmingly voted "no convention," the figures for the last vote being, for separation 14,872, and against separation 34,023. The majority in the whole State on the second vote was, however, for secession. How difficult it was to stand by principles and remain loyal to the Union no one can appreciate better than a loyal East Tennesseean of war times. Missouri, Maryland, and Kentucky did not secede, but they were under the restraining influences of the presence of Federal armies. West Virginia furnishes the nearest comparison, but the people of that State were also encouraged by the presence of Federal soldiers. East Tennessee was isolated, and the Confederate soldiers patrolled it in order to keep in subjugation the few loyal men who had not fled to the Union armies in Kentucky. Over 35,000 Union soldiers came from East Tennessee, a splendid contribution to the Northern arms.

The loyal people of East Tennessee drew their inspiration from the patriotic speeches of Webster and Clay and the magnificent example of President Jackson. The latter, in 1832, crushed nullification, and, in his dying hours declared that if the leaders in that scheme had persisted he would have hanged them as high as Haman. Another reason why the people remained loyal was that strong and determined leaders encouraged them and shared their perils. Western North Carolina, Southwestern Virginia, Northern Alabama, and Northern Georgia contained thousands of men who were equally loyal to the Union, but without such leaders this feeling of loyalty was gradually subdued and extinguished. They became an easy prey to the secession leaders, and thus loyal legions were lost to the Union. They became assimilated with the followers of the Confederacy, and were forever lost as a party or a conservative element in those States.

"On the other hand, the Union men of East Tennessee," as the author says, "after a lapse of thirty-five years, stand out today as distinct in their political opinions and party relations as they did in June, 1861. They still revere the old Union with idolatrous devotion. Seldom in the history of nations has a people shown a higher, a sublimer love for a cause which they esteemed just and wise. No more splendid record of patriotic ardor can be found in our National annals. As long as unselfish patriotism, unyielding constancy, heroic courage, and noble sacrifice for country excite admiration, so long will the conduct of these Union men of East Tennessee command the respect and challenge the homage of mankind."

The author was an eye witness of as well as an actor in many of the stirring scenes described in this volume. He knew the leading men of war times whom he here describes, and no man living is better fitted to chronicle the doings of those times in his native State. He has performed his task in a most acceptable manner, and all students of American history will welcome the companion volume, now in preparation, describing the Union leaders of East Tennessee.

Rossetti's "Hand and Soul."*

The present is one of the most attractive of all the dainty reprints issued by Thomas Mosher, who, by the way, is said to object to being called the William Morris of America; wishing instead to be praised or blamed entirely on his own merits as Thomas B. Mosher of Portland, Me.

Rossetti's only complete tale, "Hand and Soul," first made its appearance in Number One of The Germ—January, 1850—having been written during a December night of the previous year. The first number of The Germ was issued in an edition of 700 copies, only 100 of them being sold; Number Two sold even worse, and Three and Four hardly at all—this little magazine, the chosen organ of the pre-Raphaelites, ceasing with that issue. As is well known, the three Rossettis were its chief supporters—Dante Gabriel Rossetti being its largest contributor, William M. Rossetti its editor, while their sister Christina contributed under an assumed name.

"Hand and Soul," according to Mr. J. Ashcroft Noble, stands "midway between the purely critical and the purely creative work. * * * A little biographical study. * * * A story of the days and work of a painter, one Chiarodell Erma, written by Mr. Dante Rossetti, and apparently meant by him to be a setting forth of his ideal of the artistic life. The Germ contains nothing with a more insistent charm than this piece of portraiture, which is instinct with a beautiful naïveté almost unique in modern writing, with a singular simplicity, austere but never bold, having that nameless grace and glamour after which elaboration often labors in vain, and with an impressive unction like that of which we are conscious as we turn over the illuminated pages of some book of devotions, which has given words to the wordless signs of generations of penitents."

So much for the beauty of the text, in which verdict we and probably all readers of this very beautiful tale will agree.

The Kelmscott Press edition was issued in 1895, in the Golden type, and in an edition of 225 copies—all on paper—its subscription price being 10 shillings; the edition now bringing about £3 15 shillings. The Vale Press edition has also greatly increased in value, and to supply the demand for a good fac simile reprint—at a reasonable price—Mr. Mosher has just issued the present volume, which is typographically very beautiful.

The paper on which the little book is printed being so unusually good, we are not surprised to hear, on Mr. Mosher's own authority, that it is of the same weight and quality of much of the Kelmscott Press paper, and was made for him specially by the same papermakers employed by Mr. Morris.

The little volume is most attractively printed, and has four beautiful borders, instead of the two employed by William Morris, the large initials in the borders being rubricated instead of being left black, as in the Kelmscott edition, which adds very much to their effectiveness.

The present edition will be found most attractive in all its various details, and should make a strong appeal to all those who love dainty printing, as well as to those who value Rossetti's prose.

The John Rylands Library.

On the 6th of October last the John Rylands Library was opened in Manchester. In a prior issue some brief mention of this library was given. To-day a better opportunity is presented of explaining how many great books there are in this library. Here in Manchester will remain forever the famous Althorp collection, purchased by Mrs. Rylands. There never was a man more careful, yet more fastidious, than was George John, second Earl of Spencer. He not only bought noted books, but wanted the finest bindings. Even a Caxton would not suffice him, unless it was in the binding of the period. The Earl sent Dibdin to the Continent to look through the old monasteries so as to induce the monks to part with their treasured books. The Earl was the patron of Roger Payne, and there were many books bound by this artist. One line of books is wondrously complete—that of the early printers. Here is the "St. Christopher," a print of 1483. Here, too, is the "Indulgence" of 1454 and 1455, the first dated piece of printing from movable type. Here are the Mazarin Bible, the first printed book; the Mainz Bible, with the first books ever printed in Italy. All the great historical collections are in this library. Here are Americana of the rarest. Volumes are here, each with an individual history.

Mrs. Rylands's additions to her husband's library have been in all directions. These books alone number some 30,000 volumes. Many of these books would have even been objects of acquisition by Earl Spencer had he found them.

Nine years ago the building for this library was begun. The outside of the structure is imposing. The interior is perfectly adapted to all the requirements of an extensive library. There is plenty of space and light. On the occasion of the opening the freedom of the city was presented to Mrs. Rylands by the corporation of Manchester.

John Rylands was a typical Manchester manufacturer, merchant, and citizen. Integrity was the breath of his life. From a humble beginning he built up a great business. He had a love for books. He believed that by reading his fellow-men would be benefited. If his tastes were for works on theology, he studied, however, history. Gradually he widened his field of reading. The Rev. Dr. McLaren, when present at the opening of the library, said: "Some could remember the very humble germ out of which this great building had grown—I mean the little library in the suburbs of Streford Mr. Rylands watched over with fostering care, and which in its measure and time was of incalculable benefit to many a struggling minister and clergyman. The same spirit transfigured and glorified was to be seen in this magnificent building."

The John Rylands Library, with its 70,000 volumes, will recall forever the munificence of its donors. Means have been provided for the growth of the library. As Dr. Fairbairn said: "No single sect will claim it as its own. No single or collective body will be able to take from it its catholic and ecumenical character. This is to be the home of the student, the made student and the student in the making."

The First Life of Lincoln.

Without doubt the first printed biography of Abraham Lincoln was also issued jointly by the New York and Chicago Tribunes as a campaign document immediately after the nomination of 1860. It was compiled by Lincoln. It was printed in cheap form, and only two or three copies are known to be in existence. As there has been considerable inquiry for the pamphlet on the part of Lincoln collectors, Mrs. F. B. Dyche of Evanston, Ill., daughter of Mr. Scripps, the author, is about to issue a reprint in a limited edition of 240 copies. It will be printed in large type, with illustrations and notes, and will form an elegant volume. The price has been put at $2 per copy and the work will appear early in the new year. Application for copies may be made to Mrs. Dyche, 1836 Sherian Road, Evanston, Ill.

The Revelations of a Race.*

None of the human family lends himself so readily to caricature as our brother in black. As the portents of our great civil war began to be ominous, even Theodore Parker wrote from Rome: "I cannot believe that our Nation is to be plunged into strife on account of a race identified with the banjo and bones."

And "identified with the banjo and bones" the negro is still, in the minds of those who associate him with minstrel shows, comic valentines, "coon songs," and gibing anecdote.

The modest little volume of "Bandanna Ballads" has a different story to tell. The delicate lyrics express in the negro's dialect his own simple emotions, or show the place he holds in the hearts of his "white folks." An artlessness and sincerity in these tender poems and a total absence of pose or of striving for effect give them a very peculiar charm.

It is, however, in her illustrations that Miss Weeden has done work absolutely unique. Each poem is accompanied with a memorial portrait, and the collection is a remarkable one. The artist has not idealized her models, not by so much as a suggestion. Here are low-browed, opaque, inarticulate faces, many of them gnarled and wrinkled, yet all wearing that expression of self-respect, that unconscious air of distinction which seemed to be the birthright of the old family negro, and which stamp him with a certain aristocracy of mien that even rags and want cannot take from him. And here are younger faces shining with careless good nature, but shadowed always by "the solemn protest" of their eyes. Here are the very "mammies" themselves, to whom the book is touchingly dedicated—dark, brooding, tender—rest and lullaby in every lineament.

In short, while other artists have caught the negro's obvious characteristics and have portrayed them with clever pencil, it has been given Miss Weeden alone to make the delineation an interpretation.

We find in this slender volume the revelation of a race, and we can only say: The

". . . The hostile lines were so near to each other that, as Cromwell's scout-master says, 'their foot was close to our noses.'

"So for some five hours the two hosts, with colors flying and match burning, looked each other in the face. It was a showery Summer afternoon. Few of the common soldiers had eaten more than the quantity of a penny loaf from Tuesday to Saturday morning; nor had they any beer, nor more water than they could find in ditches and places trampled into puddles by the horses' feet. The Parliamentarians in the standing corn, hungry and wet, beguiled the time in singing hymns. . . .

". . . Five o'clock came, and a strange stillness fell upon them all. Rupert said to Newcastle that there would be no fight that day, and Newcastle rode to his great coach, standing not far off, called for a pipe of tobacco, and composed himself for the evening. He was soon disturbed. At seven o'clock the flame of battle leaped forth, the low hum of the two armed hosts in an instant changed into fierce uproar, and before many minutes the moor and the slope of the hill were covered with bloodshed and disorder. Who gave the sign for the general engagement we do not know, and it is even likely that no sign as the result of deliberate and concerted plan was ever given at all. . . ."

Pictures of the Week.

It seems strange to the art writer who for nearly a quarter of a century has followed the annual exhibitions of the old Academy of Design, and who has naturally come to associate them in his mind with that period of the year when "the Winter is over and past, and the singing of birds has come," whence the annual display has come to be known as "The Spring Academy," to be called upon this year to review it, not only in new quarters, but on the eve of New Year's Day—too late for an Autumn, and too early for a Spring display.

***

It was a long journey for an organization which has passed its threescore years and ten to make from Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street to Seventh Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, and yet the Academy of Design for its seventy-fifth exhibition has made this journey, and, omitting its Autumn display, makes its annual bow in the galleries of its younger rival, the Society of American Artists, in West Fifty-seventh Street, and at midwinter. Like the older man or woman who, with bent frame and seeming feebleness, sometimes in late life, makes a change of residence to, as it were, renew their youth, the old Academy is apparently rejuvenated by its abandonment of its old quarters, and presents to its friends in the modern, commodious, and well-lighted galleries of the Fine Arts Building a more than ordinarily good display. It has this year cut down the number of its exhibits a little, and there are some twenty less paintings hung than last year. Of these, there are 298 oils, which occupy the Vanderbilt, South, Middle, and East Galleries, five portrait medallions by Charles Calverley, five pieces of sculpture, two by Austin Hays, one by G. R. Roth, and two by Margaret K. Spencer; Charles H. Niehaus's well-known heroic figures of Gov. Morgan, Admiral Farragut, and Abraham Lincoln, and three cases of miniatures, and some scattered miniatures.

***

The prizes which were awarded on Thursday, and a description of which was given yesterday in THE NEW YORK TIMES, were won, the Clarke, by Charles Schreyvogel, the Dodge by Miss P. A. Bunker, and the three Hallgartens by Louis Paul Dessar, E. Irving Coues, and W. Granville-Smith, respectively. Some criticism will doubtless lie against the awarding of the Clarke and the third Hallgarten prize. Mr. Schreyvogel's painting of three Western cowboys on their broncos, careering across a stretch of Western desert, while spirited in action, and somewhat more refined and better in color than Mr. Remington's well known sketches of the same subject, is really more of an illustration—almost a photographic illustration, in the natural but ugly position of the horses' legs—than a picture, and it is difficult to see on what grounds the prize was awarded to it. While Mr. Granville-Smith's interior with figures, "The Light of the House," tells a good story, and has soft light, the figures are stiff, and there are a number of much better pictures which were more deserving of the prize. Miss Bunker's little landscape, which won the Dodge prize for the best picture by a woman, while unimportant, is pleasingly soft in tone and color, and has both sympathy and sentiment. Louis Paul Dessar's first Hallgarten prize picture, "Landscape with Sheep," is suggestive of both Jacque and Dupré, but has rich color quality and delightful sentiment, and E. Irving Coues's "Along the Quay," which won the second Hallgarten prize, is an unpretentious and clever little impression in cool browns and grays, the moonlight effect cleverly managed.

***

So much for the prize pictures. Now for the exhibition itself. There are fewer old favorites, and most of these, with the exception of certain portraits which will obtrude, are not unpleasantly conspicuous even in their places on the line. Of the portraits in the Vanderbilt gallery those which will attract the most attention are Irving Wiles's portrait of Mrs. Wiles, a portrait by George Hughes, Daniel Huntington's portrait of M. K. Jesup, Mrs. Henry A. Loops's of "A Lady," Eastman Johnson's of "Gen. Thomas Davies," Ciara T. MacChesney's of "Dr. Moncure Conway," Carroll Beckwith's of "Mrs. Jennings," Benjamin C. Porter's of "A Lady," Eastman Johnson's of the "Hon. Whitelaw Reid," and Frank Fowler's of "Mr. H. G. Hyde." Of these Mr. Wiles's portrait is fresh in color and has a certain charm, but the figure is stiff and the background too sketchy. Mr. Hughes's portrait is refined in treatment and well posed; Mr. Huntington's of "Mr. Jesup" is a good likeness; Mrs. Loops's of "A Lady" is fresh and good in color; Mr. Johnson's of "Gen. Davies" is virile and well drawn and colored; Miss MacChesney's of "Dr. Conway" is a good likeness; Mr. Beckwith's of "Mrs. Jennings" is good in color and an excellent piece of drawing, and serious in mood, and Mr. Fowler's of "Mr. Hyde" is fresh in color and notable for its fine rendering of natural and natural expression.

***

In the south gallery the most striking portraits are by Percival de Luce; of "Dr. Wood," by Carroll Beckwith—a strong piece of work, extremely good in color and well posed, and drawn; Charles Noel Flagg's striking portrait of the late Jared B. Flagg; Charles E. Proctor's portrait of "Mrs. A.," with its sweet expression and clever effect of reflected light; Clara M. Burd's decorative "Portrait of a Lady"; Augustus Fransen's portrait, a thoughtful, well-painted one, and Edoardo Gordigiani's portrait of Mme. Duse, in some ways one of the best in the display, notable for the graceful pose, the sweet and tender expression, and the rendering of the texture of the white satin embroidered gown. The artist has put soul into this portrait of the great actress, which he has evidently painted con amore, and has made of it a striking work.

***

***

In the South Gallery mention must be made this morning of E. A. Bell's decorative and harmonious tone study, "At Twilight"; Arthur Parton's charming plein air landscape, "Clearing Skies"; George H. Bogert's, "Afternoon—Katwyck"; J. G. R. Barse, Jr.'s, fine decorative study, "The Awakening"; R. M. L. Walsh's gracefully drawn and delicately colored "Dancing the Minuet," H. R. Butler's strong landscape, with its simple composition, fine distance, and tender feeling; Edward Gay's "Late Afternoon," with its golden light and good sentiment, and Henry Mosler's "Day Dreams," with its charming sunlight effect, fresh, cool color, and good outdoor feeling. Further notice of the exhibition must be left for a second review.

Notes of the Week.

The paintings, art objects, silverware, porcelain, and bric-à-brac owned by the late Judge Hilton will be sold in the late Winter or early Spring at auction, after their exhibition at the American Art Galleries. Judge Hilton was an art collector for several years, and left about 200 paintings, mostly by the painters of the modern French school, and an exceptionally fine collection of silverware and bric-à-brac. His collection of pictures can, however, hardly be called a famous one. It includes a few celebrated canvases, notably Meissonier's "Portrait of Himself," and his "L'Aumone," two good Daubignys, a fair Corot, an excellent Jacque, "The Edge of the Forest," and examples of Gerome, Vibert, Dupré, Makart, Munkacsy, Bouguereau, Ziem, Rico, Madrazo, Leloir, and Delacroix. The collection of silverware, porcelain, bric-à-brac, &c., contains so many numbers that it may require six daily sales to dispose of them.

The coming exhibition of paintings and studio effects of the well-known genre painter, Henry Mosler, which opens at the American Art Galleries on Jan. 11, and which will be followed by their sale on Jan. 18, is attracting much preliminary attention among art lovers. Mr. Mosler, who is about to go abroad for an indefinite stay, has decided to put on the market some ninety of his oils, a few water colors, and several interesting examples in oil and water color of the modern German, French, and English schools. Among the oils will be his strong canvases, "The Last Moments," "Invoking God's Blessing," and "The Ghost Story." Mr. Mosler's career is almost too well known to be repeated, but it is interesting to recall that he was born in America, studied in Dusseldorf under Profs. Mucke and Kindler, and in Paris under Hebert. Returning to his home in Cincinnati in 1868, he painted a number of pictures, chiefly war subjects, which brought him deserved fame and reputation. He returned for the second time to Europe in 1870, and after a short stay, he went again to Europe in 1889, and finally in 1894 returned to America, where he has remained since that time.

A summary of the honors that Mr. Mosler has received is as follows: Medal, Royal Academy, Munich, 1874; Salon, honorable mention, 1879; "Le Retour," purchased by the French Government for the Musée de Luxembourg, 1879; gold medal, International Exhibition, Nice, France, 1884; Prize Fund Exhibition, New York, prize $2,500, 1885. Salon, gold medal, 1888; Exposition Universelle, Paris, silver medal, 1889; Hors Concours, 1889; Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur, France, 1892; Officier d'Academie, France, 1892; Archduke Carl Ludwig of Austria, gold medal, 1896; elected Associate of National Academy of Design, 1895; grand gold medal and diploma of honor, Atlanta Exposition, Ga., 1895; Thomas B. Clarke prize, National Academy of Design, 1896; gold medal, "The Art Club," Philadelphia, 1897. His pictures have been purchased by and are in the following museums and cities: The Luxembourg, Paris; Sydney, Australia; Grenoble, France; Louisville (Ky.) Polytechnic Institute, Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Cincinnati (Ohio) Museum, Springfield (Mass.) Museum, and Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Dr. T. Gaillard Thomas has presented to the New York Academy of Medicine a portrait of Dr. John T. Metcalfe, painted by Lasarus. Dr. Metcalfe was one of the most distinguished American physicians, and both from his high professional and social position was widely known both in this city and the country. Since his retirement from active practice he has lived at Cold Spring-on-the-Hudson. His many pupils, admirers, and friends will most highly appreciate Dr. Thomas's gift.

Mr. Frederick S. Gibbs of this city has recently surprised a number of his acquaintances, who had known him in politics and in business as a "good fellow" and a lover of practical jokes, by appearing in the rôle of an art collector. It seems that Mr. Gibbs has been leading to these friends, as it were, a social and artistic double life for some years past, and with unusual taste and discrimination has acquired a collection of several hundred oils by the best known and most able American artists, and also a number of excellent examples of such well-known foreign painters as Berne-Bellecour, Col, Corot, Criefelds, Desgoffe, Escosura, Grison, Gouble, Grolleron, Isabey, Jacque, Knaus, Meissonier, Plot, Roble, Vibert, Worms, and Zamacois. These paintings, to which Mr. Gibbs is constantly adding, are hung on the walls of almost all the rooms of his residence, 421 West Twenty-second Street. Mr. Gibbs has recently published for private circulation an illustrated catalogue of his collection bound in olive-green suede, which in care of compilation and the excellence of the half-tone reproductions of some of his most interesting canvases is the daintiest and most attractive little catalogue of the kind that has yet been published in New York. A novel feature of this catalogue is the photographs of a number of well-known artists, taken for the most part while at work in their studios. Particularly good among these are those representing Carl J. Blenner, J. G. Brown, J. H. Dolph, James M. Hart, the late George Inness, and Arthur Parton. These pictures—for they are more than photographs—of themselves make this catalogue a valuable addition to any art library.

There is now on exhibition at the American Art Galleries a collection of modern Japanese paintings, made in Japan under the personal supervision of Prof. Ernest Fenolosa. These paintings were brought to this country by Mr. J. B. Millet of Boston, a brother of the well-known American artist, Frank Millet. The chief feature of these paintings is their naturalness. It is sometimes almost impossible to believe that the representations of a bird's wing, of a fish's scales, or of a flower's petals, are not the real objects themselves. The modern Japanese artist is a master of the use of the line, and is certainly a colorist. In landscape work he lacks the knowledge of light and shade, and of perspective, and so his landscape work seems somewhat crude. Most of the paintings are on paper and silk, but some are on lacquer. The use of silk gives an opportunity for the rendition of tone and gradation of color. The paintings on lacquer are especially clever.

In The New York Times Saturday Review:

A few years ago a kind friend in Maine—Mr. E. Holmes in Westbrook—sent me your SATURDAY REVIEW of the 4th inst., containing a review of John Bartain's "Reminiscences of a Very Old Man." These reminiscences present another instance of the confusion and contradictions which the various biographers of Poe have contrived to muddle about the events in his life. I find the following words quoted in the current (November) number of The Critic:

Early on Monday afternoon he [Poe] suddenly entered my engraving room, [in Philadelphia.] * * * He told me he had been on his way to New York. * * * When the train arrived at the down-town station he gave them [his fancied pursuers] the slip, and returned to Philadelphia.

You add: "He borrowed some money and left for New York." Bartain continues: "In about a month from this, as near as I can make out, Poe lay dead in a Baltimore hospital," thus fixing the time of the visit in the first days of September, 1849. Now, according to the record, which, of course, is correct, touching the point in view, the departure from New York from the house of Stella Lewis, in Brooklyn, occurred on the morning of June 30. I at any rate have never before seen or heard of an intimation that there was a return afterward any further north than Baltimore—rather, Havre de Grace. Three questions offer themselves:

1. Did the memory confound a (an imagined) journey to New York in September with the one from that city in June? There seems to have been a vague, unauthenticated, probably manufactured, report of "the poet's misfortune that he had to visit Philadelphia," &c.

2. Was there a mistake in the year—instead of 1849 was it 1848? Let us do a bit of tracing with Mr. Ingram as guide.

On Page 152 (Volume II.) it is said that "directly after the publication of 'Eureka' [by Putnam] he [Poe] started on his long projected tour. He is first heard of at Richmond." On Page 143 a note to Mrs. Spero, dated "Thursday, March 30," requests Mr. H. to call "at Fordham next Sunday." This Sunday was April 2. Allowing less than a week for the "final revisions," (Page 144,) the Saturday mentioned by Putnam (Page 145) was the 8th, and the Monday when a decision was promised (same page) was the 10th. The "few weeks" (Page 146) during which the press was at work could not well have been fewer than four. Then the journey to Richmond may have been made about May 30. It appears that on June 10 (Page 165) Poe wrote to an English acquaintance, (Miss Anna Blackwell;) that soon after the letter reached its destination its recipient met Miss Maria McIntosh at Mrs. Whitman's house, and that Miss McIntosh remarked to Mrs. Whitman, (Page 166:) "On such a night as this, one month ago," (observe the significant, momentous unit measure of time again,) "I met Mr. Poe in Fordham."

Was Miss Blackwell addressed from Richmond? If so, the stay there continued as late as the 10th of June. How much, if any, longer, Ingram does not definitely inform us. His account (Pages 153 through 159) of transactions, including the joint composition of "The Bells" and ending with the inditing in June of this year (1849) of "the last letter" to Mrs. Spero, indicates a period of several weeks passed after the coming back to Fordham before the expiration of the month.

A Chicago weekly periodical in April, 1889, brought forth from hitherto hidden annals a letter addressed by John R. Thompson, editor of The Southern Literary Messenger, to one Patterson, who was to assist in the publication of "The Stylus." This epistle seems to have been dated at Richmond on Nov. 9, 1849, (a month or two subsequent to the final—bodily!—disappearance of the subject of it; so that there was not likely to be any fault in recollection.) The writer says:

My first acquaintance with the deceased was in the Spring of 1848, when I accidentally [mark the chance interposition!] learned that a person calling himself Edgar A. Poe had been for a fortnight in a debauch in one of the lowest haunts of vice upon the wharves in this city. * * * As soon as I heard the name of Poe in this connection, my worst suspicions were excited, and I at once took a carriage and went to seek him. It was a very warm day in the latter part of May or early in June. I learned that such a person had, indeed, been there drunken for two weeks, [Note here, as in every other declaration of drunkenness which has been put upon the ..... in the case, that the plaintiff, if reputable, avers not from his own cognizance,] and that he had gone a few hours previous, without hat or coat, to the residence of Mr. John MacKenzie, some three miles distant in the country, alone and on foot. It was Poe. The next day he called on me with Mr. Mac. From that time until his death we were much together and in constant correspondence.

In view of the whole zigzag train of evidence, just about how much together could they have been? And does the same testimony satisfactorily prove the statements of Miss McIntosh that she talked with Poe in Fordham one month before, a few days after June 10?

3. Did he, of Richmond, by means of a sort of triple-power-telepathy—a radiator of mind speech, (a wireless telephone,) and the images of material things—operate upon him in Philadelphia, without being actually, physically, present? On Jan. 15, 1865, Mrs. Whitman wrote, asking: "Do you remember that I once spoke of the strange spiritual energy or effluence which seems to surround or enspher 'The Raven,' and which acted on those who were en rapport with him, enhancing and intensifying the spiritual faculties of insight and intuition? And do you recall my mention of an impression which suddenly struck me of the original identity of the names of Power" (her maiden appellation) "and Poe!" The information indicated was substantially this: "We were sitting together (in the Autumn of 1848) when all at once it flashed upon me that we were blood relations. I looked up at Poe. His eyes were fixed intensely upon me. On telling him of the thought that had come to me, he said: 'Helen, you startle me! Thereby hangs a tale.' He then gave me an outline of the history of his ancestors as he reckoned them—of the Powers, the Le Poers, and the De le Poes." G. W. E.

American Writers in English Papers.

We seem to have a hard time in getting the English people to understand us—in making them understand our life and appreciate our art. Our own countrymen do not always show judgment in telling them about America, which seems a pity when they are asked to do so after an effort on the part of the English to outgrow their pride in not knowing anything about us. Following its example at the last Christmas time, when it undertook to give examples of original work from the colonies, The Englishwoman has devoted its Christmas number to works by American authors. A note from the editor states that the purport of the number is "to remind the forgetful world of the incidents which prove that the English and the American people are one race and of one blood," and to bind "the bonds of Anglo-American brotherhood." As a factor in this international welding there are no criticisms to be made against the paper, but apart from its commercial aspect, so to speak, we want the paper to help its readers in crediting America with a maturing art of letters. In this respect The Englishwoman has not made a very successful attempt, which is specially to be regretted in the case of this old and widely read family paper. Despite the fact that eight of the best-known names in our literary field are displayed, the subjects of their eight stories seem poorly chosen for the English reader, and the authors have not shown their best writing.

To review its contents, Eliza Orne White gives a not too interesting story of homely New England life, depicting local Yankee characters that interest us only because we are familiar with kindred originals. A reader of one nation involuntarily looks for national types in the literature of another nation, and if that literature depicts a too local character, it is either misguiding or unintelligible. The same criticism can be made of Sarah Orne Jewett's story of a New England celebration, though the thread of the story is more pleasing than that of the other.

There is a war sketch by Stephen Crane and a rather Frenchy story by Julian Hawthorne entitled "Ormiston's Wife." Characteristic funny touches enliven W. L. Alden's story of complications that arose from crossed telephone wires in Chicago, and a glimpse is given of a certain daring quality to be found in our Western girls.

The three stories by Henry James, W. D. Howells, and Mary E. Wilkins are the only ones that give any quality to the Christmas Englishwoman, but even these seem quite below the possibilities of their authors. As a whole, the contents of the paper do not at all represent American literature or depict American life. They are a collection of mild, absolutely harmless, though abominably illustrated, tales and sketches that may interest the English "gentlewoman," but would never do in the world for the American "vigorous woman."

Up to date an author has felt a social, and, at most, a national duty to further the cause of man, but The Englishwoman has now imposed an extension of this to an international duty. Slowly, then, as the burden of the world descends upon the shoulders of these crowned kings of artists, authors must weigh in an international balance the goods they sell to other lands, duly regretting that by not sufficiently "binding the bonds of Anglo-American brotherhood" in this Christmas number they have perhaps lost us a second island in Samoa.

The Making of Genealogies.*

The genealogical record is the result of the most patient labor. Search for it must be made in histories, sermons, reports, official statistics, inscriptions, family genealogies, public and private documents, such as church and town records, wills, deeds, marriage licenses and certificates, Bible records, diaries, notebooks, &c. "Is it a fad?" The author of "Foundations of Genealogy" declares that there is no faddism in it. Sometimes, however, there are societies with long names that hunt up records, only trying to show they are particularly descended from Kings and Queens. This is an absurdity too common in many American records. Not satisfied in showing that "John Jones" landed in New Jersey in 1686, the fancy genealogist goes backward a thousand years more or less and prints it that "Jones came down in straight line from 'Ap Jones,' who fought the Conqueror in the twelfth century." The conscientious genealogical record maker must face an enormous amount of work. Sometimes a year or more may elapse before an important link in the chain is found. You must know a great deal about history and social conditions in Europe of the last two centuries. There are certain rules which the author indicates which are to be followed. Mr. William Stowell Mills writes most intelligently of the art of making genealogies, the difficulties of which he does not ignore.

A Call to Arms.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

At last some brave souls are manifesting [illegible]

is my experience and opinion that this one work is the innocent cause of more absolute hypocrisy, especially among the young, than any other in type, not excepting "Pride and Prejudice" and "Sense and Sensibility." They must adore these three dreary volumes. Their preceptors tell them it is correct taste. Not to bow down is to be lost in outer darkness. And the wretched victims set up hypocritical paeans lauding the very instruments of their torture. Let the downtrodden arise and say: "I don't like 'Les Miserables'! I consider 'The Man Who Laughs' a piece of padded imbecility and 'The Toilers of the Sea' an excrescence on nineteenth century literature!"

And let some of us honestly confess we don't enjoy Jane Austen, but consider her an unmitigated bore, and a fad of the literary resurrectionists. It's a long worm that has no turning. Aux armes, mes enfants!

What, How, and Where to Read.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Mr. Saunders and the editor have told us all in these columns what books we should read. Still better, they have told us how to read them. May a word be said now in suggestion of the importance of where we read? It makes a big difference, and particularly with poetry.

By the Winter fireside we can enjoy our Homer, Racine, or the story of the Cid; Shakespeare and Sophocles fit in with any mood; but the out-of-door poets must be read out of doors. Burns cannot be rightly understood in any other way, nor Scott. An intense love for nature is one of the special traits of our modern men, and for a true appreciation of their poems we should read them with the illustrations about us. Even the early ballads gain new meaning under the blue sky, for music born of wandering sound has passed into those words. Have not many of you paused to rest beside a brook, and heard it repeat, "I've wandered east, I've wandered west, by many a weary way"? The man who wrote that had the brook's music in his head. A wilder, stronger refrain runs through Kipling's "White Horses." It has all the roar and the rush and the bracing salt air of the sea. Before you go on your yacht or on the steamer slip the poem in your pocket; or, better, commit it to memory. Then, when you lean over the rail and spy the "vanguard," notice the perfection of those lines which herald "the coming of the herd."

Keats and "The Culprit Fay," we think, should be read at the first lighting of the lamps, before the last glow of the sunset has faded from the sky.

Finally, there is a little poem that we love, in four short stanzas, but not for worlds would we have you read it first in city streets. It requires an accompaniment of silence and a certain grandeur of background.

You must first know and love a far-off mountain lake. Next, you should be awakened in this retreat at about 3 A. M. by the tapping of fishing tackle on your window. Hurrying on a mackintosh and shawl you will rush out and join your friends. Suddenly, as you face the east, a ray shoots up behind a distant peak, and then slowly Venus, the morning star, rises and seems to rest for a moment poised on the summit. At no other time, and in no other place, does she ever appear in such entrancing beauty.

Next, as you are up, and in a reverent mood, walk to the nearest height and climb slowly, listening, at sunrise, to the hermit thrush. Then, and not until then, go back and read, "Before the Daybreak."

The Browning Letters.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In your SATURDAY REVIEW of Dec. 16 there is a letter signed Emily C. Cobb, which is a criticism of my article on the subject above. The writer deplores the fact that the Brownings, who "have been so loved and honored in this country," should have any disturbing impressions attached to their memory. She also says that "it seems impossible that Mr. or Mrs. Browning should have held our American men of letters in contempt," and goes on to cite incidents of their intimacy with Americans. This professed admirer could scarcely have read the Browning letters, or she would have seen what she may still see by reference to the book—that, in mentioning the things to which I objected, I quoted from the letters of both the Brownings verbatim et literatim. I will not yield to this writer, nor to any one else, in my profound admiration for the genius of Mr. and Mrs. Browning; I even enjoy "Sordello," with all its obscurity, which even the devoted Mrs. Browning could not shut her eyes to, and which was so humorously attacked by Tennyson. I love their poems and all that they wrote. If Mrs., or Miss, Cobb will refer to my article in THE REVIEW she will see that I there said that the letters were "a delightful contribution to literature, we are all agreed." But are we to be forbidden to criticise what strikes us as deserving criticism, simply because the writers are famous, or even beloved? I love the Brownings, but I love my country and her poets better, and I did not like what they said of our writers. Later in life the Brownings were forced to respect American genius, and they would have shown the basest ingratitude had they not evinced their appreciation of our friendship toward them. No one can doubt that, were they living, they would regret the publication of the [illegible]

Mr. Stillman's career as artist, editor, and newspaper correspondent in various foreign countries has brought him into touch with many of the most striking personages and events of the last fifty years. The writer may be sure, though, that, however impossible it may seem to her that the dear Brownings said those ugly things of us, I was entirely accurate in my quotations, which I would like to have her verify. When she does this, I hope she will read the book through, and get the same enjoyment from it that it afforded me.

"The Night Before Christmas."

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

It is not so long ago that Bishop Clement C. Moore's old residence in New York's Chelsea was torn down. I remember it well. The whole block bounded by Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets and Ninth and Tenth Avenues was, as late as 1855, a hill, with high stone walls supporting it on the street and avenue sides. I used to take my sled up in front of the old mansion and slide down hill, out at the northwest corner of Twenty-second Street and Ninth Avenue. That was the mansion in which "The Visit of St. Nicholas" was written. And those were the days before the day of horse cars, when omnibuses ran in Summer and big stage-sleighs in Winter, for the snow staid on the ground weeks at a time. I saw that old hill dug down and carted away, and that Winter, 1856, I think it was, the Tenth Avenue end of the block was not built upon, and rain collected and froze in the excavated cellars, and I skated there. By the way, I think that the fine pile of buildings of the Theological Seminary is due to the generosity of Dean Hoffman, though the ground was given by Bishop Moore, a tablet to whose memory is in beautiful old St. Peter's Church, in Twentieth Street, near Ninth Avenue. I used to play cricket in the seminary grounds, and there were then only three buildings, all of rough-hewn stone, about in the centre of the block. But I will say no more, or I shall ramble too long and too far.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

"Rejected Manuscripts Not All Unworthy."—May it not be that magazine editors, book publishers, and even readers of manuscripts may not be able to see the good points in articles submitted to them, and still, as they pleasantly say, with their rejection, "This does not mean that the article does not possess literary merit"? So let the writers "try, try again, for after several rejections they may be astonished with an acceptance, as was Dr. Burn in the year 1700 and something, as the following account of an experience of his will show:

"This industrious divine having compiled with great labor and at no small expense his 'Justice of the Peace,' came up to London to dispose of the copy to as great an advantage as possible. After hawking it about among different booksellers, some of whom absolutely slighted it, and others offered him terms which he despised, he resolved to return home and bury the manuscript in oblivion. On mentioning his business and disappointment to his landlord, mine host, who was a good-natured fellow, but no scholar, advised him to apply to Andrew Millar, who sometimes used his house and lived in the neighborhood. Mr. Burn took his counsel and the manuscript was committed to Millar for examination. The bookseller desired a friend of his belonging to the profession to give his judgment of it, who soon returned it with an encomium. On Burn's calling to know its fate, Millar asked him his terms, to which the other candidly told him that the highest price he had been offered for it was 20 guineas. 'Sir,' said Millar, 'I will give you £200 for the sheet, and if it reaches another edition I will make you a further compensa-

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 30, 1899.

LOCAL HISTORY IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

The question of the adequate and systematic preservation of local records is being vigorously gone into in England at the present time, a strong committee having been formed—appointed by the First Lord of the Treasury and consisting of the Bishop of London, Mr. Bryce; Sir H. Maxwell-Lyte, Sir Francis Mowatt, Sir C. P. Ilbert, and Mr. Stephen Spring-Rice. This committee has been instructed to inquire into all existing arrangements for the collection, indexing, and calendaring of local records, and their proper custody. It has also been instructed to report what further steps can be taken toward the perfecting of such archives.

The committee's first step was the preparation of sets of questions herewith given—the first set inquiring as to present arrangements, the second asking for suggestions toward a better and fuller system. These questions, with a request for their proper filling out and speedy return, are to be sent to all English Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons; to all Clerks of the County Councils, to Town Clerks of English municipal boroughs, to the Provosts of Scots Royal and Parliamentary boroughs, to Irish corporations, to the learned societies, archaeological and others; to the Professors of History in the various universities and colleges, and to many others, so that the ground may be as completely covered as possible all through the United Kingdom. The questions are as follows:

I.—With reference to existing arrangements in the place or district with which you are familiar, it would be useful to know—

1. What collections of documents relating to the history of the locality already exist? What is the general nature of their contents?
2. Are they in public or private custody?
3. In what building are they contained?
4. (a) Is the accommodation sufficient and satisfactory? In particular (b) is the building fire-proof and dry, and (c) are the rooms well lighted and otherwise adapted for the use of those who may wish to consult them?
5. (a) Who are the custodians? (b) By whom are they appointed? (c) What guarantees, if any, are there for the appointment of persons with proper qualifications? (d) How are they paid? (e) Do they discharge any other functions?
6. What funds are available for the maintenance of the collection or for adding to its contents?
7. (a) How are the documents classified and arranged? (b) Is there any list of or index to the contents of the collections? (c) If so, is it written or printed?
8. To what date do the oldest documents go back?
9. Have any of them been printed or calendared?
10. (a) At what times and under what conditions are members of the public allowed to inspect or copy documents in the collection? (b) Are there any rules about lending out documents? (c) If so, have they worked well?
11. Have any of the documents, within your knowledge, been destroyed or injured by fire, damp, or other cause?

II.—With reference to future arrangements, the following questions, among others, appear to deserve consideration:

1. Is it desirable to establish throughout the country local offices, under public control, for the preservation, arrangement, and study of documents relating to the history and administration of the district?
2. If so, what local centres should be chosen, and what authorities, local or central, should be intrusted with the duty of supervision?
3. What documents relating to local administration should be continuously preserved?
4. What inducements can be offered to owners of documents of antiquarian value, whether general, ecclesiastical, local, or personal in their character, to place them in public custody?

If the local records of all parts of a country were carefully collected and suitably filed and preserved, it would be a very simple task for any one who wished to study the history of a particular locality or place, or to trace family records or other events, to go to the proper custodian and there find an accurately indexed list of all the documents relating to his chosen subject.

Local societies and people interested in local history and antiquarian research have done much toward hunting out and making record of such old documents; but unfortunately they have had no power to take steps for their proper preservation. The extraction of history from archives is a very modern pursuit and only a trained student can successfully accomplish it. Very few can even read these ancient documents, which in England often go back to the beginnings of the nation, and fewer still can interpret them.

This movement, while of the greatest importance to England, should yet appeal strongly to Americans, so many of our own beginnings springing from that country. The carelessness with which such old documents are often treated by those who are really responsible for their custody, or at least to a great degree. These old records are usually treated carelessly or as of little or no account, and in some instances have even been recklessly destroyed.

The public records of state were in an equally deplorable condition in England until quite recently—within the present reign, indeed—when such records as had escaped "the moths, the maggots, the rats, the damp, the dust, the decay, and the neglect of ages" were suitably housed and taken care of. William Prynne, the Keeper of the Records in the Tower in the time of Charles II., declared his charge to be so "foul, dusty, and nasty that no one cared to touch or sort them," and yet they were allowed to remain in that condition for more than a century and a half before any proper care was taken of them. While it is possible this committee may find English local records comparatively well preserved and arranged in some few instances, in most cases they will be found in a very neglected condition and so housed and arranged that those who wish to consult them would need unlimited time and patience to carry on such research.

It is hoped that not only may an adequate system of searching out, filing, and listing the documents relating to the local history of a place or section be brought about, but with so much success and in so systematic a manner as to lead private individuals all over England to file important family papers among such archives, with the understanding that while such papers would be safer, better cared for, and more easily consulted, either by their owners or any one else authorised to investigate them, than they could possibly be if retained in their own custody. The private archives so deposited would be so left for safekeeping only—full rights to access, control, and removal being vested in the original owners. The smaller college libraries at Oxford, for instance, have already transferred their private archives and most valuable manuscripts to the Bodleian Library, where they are not only safer but more easily consulted by students. While it will probably be a long time before a completely satisfactory system is devised and carried out for such recovery of and proper preservation of the local records in England, it is sure finally to come about.

But in America the condition of things is even worse. Our own beginnings being of such comparatively recent date, the collection of documents and data belonging to local history would be a much simpler task. It has been said that until well into the present century Americans were so busy making history that they had no time for the collection or study of documents relating to their country. But in the last fifty years or more, historical societies have sprung up all over the country, local histories have been written, the histories of old parishes, of villages, towns, and cities have multiplied and a rapidly growing taste for all sorts of antiquarian subjects has been fostered. Besides this, more and more attention is being paid to the history of American families, which have been traced step by step, from their progenitors on the other side of the water, through their first settlement in America, their intermarriages with other families, and perhaps with other races, down to the present day—all of which will be found more and more necessary to a proper understanding of historical subjects.

The foundation and growth of the various societies, the Holland Society, the Colonial Dames, the Daughters of the Revolution, the Sons of the Revolution, and all such kindred societies, to name a few only, have done much to further an interest in such family history. The very fact that candidates for election to such societies must show the descent necessary to entitle them to membership has led to a search for and careful preservation of all family documents, many of which will be found of the utmost importance to those who are to write the local histories of the future.

But while the outlook for the preservation and proper custody of our own documents is slightly more encouraging than it was years ago, it is still only in crude fashion and in exceptional localities that such records are as yet appreciated at anything like their full value. Our Nation being such a thoroughly composite one, the first arrival and the gradual growth and spreading of the various races which from time to time have become component parts of the American Nation, as well as the peculiar institutions and customs established and encouraged by them, with their important bearing on the entire country, should be investigated and all proper records of the early days saved and properly cared for while there is yet time.

Such old records are to be found all over our country, in parish registers, in the early records of old corporations, in the books of the old town and village clerks, and in county archives. Important records, too, are preserved in old deeds, wills, grants of land, and other family papers; in the records of the Indian tribes; in fact, in all sorts of old documents, which to many seem simply curious, but which to the historian, whether of a family, a place, or an institution, are simply invaluable.

Each year as it passes makes it harder and harder to recover and properly provide for the custody of such old records, and it is to be hoped that sufficient interest in the subject may be awakened to lead to the initial steps being taken toward bringing about such important results.

Our great libraries are coming more and more to see the wisdom of collecting all papers, pamphlets, and books which bear upon the local history of any portion of our country. Dr. Billings, Director of the New York Public Library, hungers and thirsts after nothing more than after this class of printed matter. Everything of the sort that comes to his mill is grist. Only those who have tried to investigate the history of an American family, or special locality, through the books and documents to be found in the collections of our historical or genealogical societies, or in any other public libraries, know how inadequate most collections really are at the present day.

The sooner we, both individually and publicly, awaken to the necessity for making and adequately caring for such collections, the easier the needed documents will be found and the fuller will the collections be made.

BOOKS WE ALL WRITE AND FEW ACKNOWLEDGE.

New Year again! Time to turn over another new leaf! The old year dies out and you again have before you the spotless pages of another year. What will you write? What have you already written?

Look on the book-shelves of your memory and glance through the volumes there. How many there are; verily, a library in itself, and filled with all sorts and conditions of books. All of your own writing. Yet you never knew you were an author—and still, every day you have been writing industriously in the Book of Life, every week adding another chapter to the volumes and every year starting out fresh and clean with a "new leaf."

In these volumes you have recorded every passing emotion more truly and surely than was ever recorded by novelist or poet. The tablets that you used were the tablets of the heart and the memory, and you began from the time they were strong enough to retain impressions.

Yours, you thought, had been a peculiarly uneventful and even life, devoid of all the excitements and varieties that go to make up a thrilling tale, and yet that little volume there with its bright cover and dashing pictures contains some strange and interesting tales of personal experience that cannot be rivaled by any of the works of fiction you have ever read. This shabby little "old edition," with the cover partly torn and the pages gnawed at the corners, are the stories of your own boyhood. The ink is all faded now and the writing is in a childish, scrawling hand, yet you can read it, and you think some of the tales are strangely like the experiences of "Peck's Bad Boy"; but further on, here, when you felt the mustache and the basso on their way, methinks Kipling's own "Stalky & Co." are no better specimens of boys' tales than are those contained in this little volume of your mental library.

There is a large volume, and strangely thick. That contains all your disappointments and your failures, and, despite yourself, you shed a tear or two as you unearth between its pages buried hopes there in business, still again in love. Dear me, how elastic is the human heart not to lie crushed and bleeding beneath all this succession of reverses.

Here are your volumes of "Gray Days and Gold," your "Reveries," and your "Dream Life." There are your "Poems of Love and Passion." Mercy, what a volume that is! And what a variety of notes you have struck! There is the boy-love, a perfect whirlwind of passion; Byron himself was never more tempestuous. And here is something more delicate, something nearer Thomas Moore; there is a lyric worthy of Tennyson, and here an ode of which Johnson himself might well be proud. In this volume, too, are all your love letters—letters that for you, at least, have more of the human interest than those of the Brownings themselves. But now the note is changed; there is a touch of coldness creeping into these sonnets, and here an unmistakable strain of jealousy. And so on and on! All the keys are sounded, and each response to the touch is echoed in this quaint little volume of your memory.

And now, reverentially, do you glance through your own "In Memoriam," bound in black and bordered in cypress. Ah! how you recall writing this volume in tears of anguish, and even now, looking through its pages, you live again each grief of your life, and again the warm tears flow, but no longer in wild rebellion, but rather in gentle sadness and resignation.

This little book tells of your "Travels," and here are your religious beliefs; yonder in the corner are your treatises on "Friendship"; on the right is a little volume on "Hate"; and here is the philosophy of your life bound in neutral tints. Your own "War Tales" are there before you, the ink on the pages not yet dry.

There they are all in full view, these books of your own life. Not a chord that has been struck in your nature but you can find it in one of these volumes. And in the years to come you will continue to unerringly register each emotion and event, until, when at last all the leaves have been turned and all the depths sounded, the work will be finished, and your mental library complete; ready to be read by that unerring Critic, and by him commended or condemned according to your own life, of which these volumes are the perfect record.

WRITERS TO THE FRONT THIS YEAR.

One of the strangest things revealed by a survey of the book publishing business for the year now drawing to a close is the fact that the books which have had the most pronounced success—the sales in some instances mounting to figures which are indeed sensational—have been the work of new writers. Fresh literary talent was never more warmly welcomed than at the present time, both by the publishers and the reading public. The foremost magazine and book publishers pride themselves on the fact that the latch-string is always out for the new writer of ability, and the right hand of fellowship is always ready to receive him.

This state of things must be a source of the greatest satisfaction to ambitious but as yet unknown authors, and is doubtless a matter of concern to the older members of the literary guild. It certainly is a most emphatic refutation of the old assertion, so often made with extreme bitterness, that the editors of our leading periodicals were influenced, if not actually controlled, by rings and cliques, and that the readers for the publishing houses were lacking in perspicacity.

"David Harum," "Richard Carvel," "When Knighthood Was in Flower," "Janice Meredith," and "The Man With the Hoe," the five pieces of literary work which have made the greatest stir on this side of the Atlantic during the past year, with one exception, are the work of new-comers in the literary world, and the credit for the production of all five, as our friend "The Cynic" will be sure to note, belongs to the sterner sex. But there is a woman close behind these triumphant male minds, and, in the opinion of many, "Prisoners of Hope" deserves a place much closer to the top of the list than it has yet attained. The fact of the matter is, the old favorites must look to their laurels, for the young contingent are making strong inroads in the popular favor, and several of the new-comers have displayed unusual brilliancy.

Radical and startling changes have taken place in the publishing world during the last few years—changes in the personnel of the publishing houses by the infusion of new blood, in the mechanical details of book making, in the methods of doing business, and in the public taste. We have in mind one English writer who, not so very long ago, had a great vogue on both sides of the Atlantic, and justly so, yet a recent work of fiction from his pen has scarcely produced a ripple on the sea of letters.

There is a brilliant array of talent among these new-comers in the competition for popular favor, and their future work will be watched with the greatest interest. American fiction has certainly been strengthened by the recent achievements of Paul Leicester Ford—as versatile as he is industrious—Winston Churchill, Mary Johnston, "Edwin Caskoden," Stephen Crane, R. W. Chambers, Booth Tarkington, Cy Warman, Cyrus Townsend Brady, Morgan Robertson, Herbert E. Hamblen, Jesse Lynch Williams, Ernest Seton Thompson, with his charming studies of animal life, and—we must write this name doggedly, or not at all—Peter Finley Dunne.

Among the writers from the British Isles who have recently come to the front and whose future work will be followed with interest may be mentioned Seumas MacManus, whose Irish tales are delightful; Alfred Ollivant, Kenneth Grahame, Egerton Castle, Maurice Hewlett, Frank T. Bullen, Eden Phillpotts, Mary Cholmondeley, Richard Whiteing, Bernard Capes, Stephen Phillips, and the mysterious Fiona Macleod, who has struck a decidedly fresh and original note.

The achievements of these writers—covering as they do the most divergent fields—are a source of satisfaction and lead to the conclusion that the outlook in the world of fiction gives promise.

NEW BOOKS AND THEIR MAKERS.

It is probably little known among the reading public how difficult it is for the publishers of books to obtain proper biographical material from their authors. The mind of the author seems to run to extremes; either he gluts the mails with family history enough to fill a volume, including pictures of himself and ancestors, to say nothing of his birthplace and present abode, or, he modestly replies that he can scarcely believe that the public can be interested in his personal affairs. Then there are authors, mostly those of one book, who fill pages and pages with long dissertations on their style and the circumstances which tended to make the one literary effort possible. But the hardest of all men from whom to obtain notes of personal history are the men of science and great learning. It is seldom that they make any reply to their publishers' requests on this score. Their indifference is sincere, however, but when they do reply it is usually to say, "It is a question of the book and not the man"; or, "The author having produced a work, the public can have no further concern with him"; or, again, "The author gives a certain part of his identity to the book; further than that—who he is and how he lives is none of the public's business."

So far as has come within our knowledge, the most enticing bait, one that rarely fails to catch the autobiographical fish, is that presented by a New York publisher, who, for obvious reasons, shall be nameless. It is presented to the various authors in letter form and usually has the desired effect. It is frank, sincere, and truthful. It reads as follows:

We receive from week to week inquiries from the literary correspondents of English and American journals concerning the "methods of work" of the authors whose books we have the pleasure of publishing. It is certainly true that a public interest exists in these literary methods, and apart from matters to be classed as personal, there may be a legitimate curiosity on the part of readers in regard to the history of books that have given them pleasure. It is in order also to report to our clients, from the business side of the publication office, that some incidental influence upon the sales of a book may occasionally be traced to references made to the author in the columns of "literary gossip." In so far, therefore, as you may be willing to help to gratify this more or less pardonable curiosity on the part of the public, we shall be prepared, on our part, to see that such information as you may place in our hands for the purpose is used with due discretion and with only the more trustworthy of the literary correspondents.

It is, perhaps, needless to say that the notes which appear from time to time in these columns are not extracted in this way. Authors' friends have usually far more interesting bits of information to convey than the authors themselves.

Mr. Eden Phillpotts, author of "Children of the Mist," who is now at work on a new novel, entitled "The Last of Her Line," to be published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, and whose "Human Boy" has just been published by Harper & Brothers, is the author of some dozen books and two plays. He is thirty-seven years old, and, although born in India, is a thorough Londoner. Mr. Phillpotts started in early youth to become a literary craftsman. His range of subjects is broad. He has written much for the magazines—articles, stories, humorous and pathetic recitations, verses—on subjects that have their action in many climes and among many and varied peoples, from Cairo and the confines of Russia to Morethampstead and his own dear Buckland Beacon. By sheer industry of the pen he had managed to extract a fair livelihood from his art until a couple of years ago his "Lying Prophets" recovered the eulogies of the most exacting critics and made the author so popular he had all literary aspirants to learn that Mr. Phillpotts kept hard at work in the office of a London fire insurance company until he was assured of a living by writing. The early lesson that he was then forced to learn—never to take chances—has, he says, been of great service to him in his later literary career.

Mr. David Dwight Wells, author of "Her Ladyship's Elephant," is about to leave London for Egypt, where he will visit Khartoum. He has just put the finishing touches to a new comic novelette, which, in all probability, Henry Holt & Co. will publish for next Summer. Just now a good story concerning "Her Ladyship's Elephant" is going the rounds of the American colony in London. It may be recalled that Mr. Wells states in the preface to his book that the only absolutely real thing in the story is the "impossible" elephant. It now seems that there are others. When the manuscript was completed Mr. Wells read it over to an American friend. "Good gracious!" exclaimed the friend, "you don't mean to say that you are going to publish that? Why, there isn't a character that I don't recognize. There is Lady so-and-so, and Sir ——." And as he went on through the list, and added, "If you don't cover up their personalities better, you'll have to get out of Mayfair society and stay out." Mr. Wells calmly rejoined, saying that he knew his English friends so well that he was quite sure they would never recognize themselves as the dramatis personae in "Her Ladyship's Elephant." "They will apply the characters to everybody but to themselves," he said. That Mr. Wells had pretty well sized up the perspicacity of his English friends is said to be proved from the fact that he is still "in" London society.

It will be recalled that Mr. Alden in his last London letter to THE TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW said some good things about Bernard Shaw's "Cashel Byron's Profession," which has lately been issued in an attractive edition by Brentano's. He said that he was quite sure that the Harpers had brought it out at the time that it appeared in England, "but somehow it did not attract notice." Mr. Alden is correct. "Cashel Byron's Profession" was first published in this country in 1886 by Harper & Brothers in The Handy Series, and the confirmation of this fact has led to the discovery of a pleasant interchange of courtesies between the publishers and the author. In 1886, there being no copyright law, the Harpers paid Mr. Shaw £10 bounty for bringing out his novel, but, as Mr. Alden writes, "it never had any marked success and has been forgotten by nearly everybody." Now, however, through the Brentano's edition the book seems to be gaining in popularity every day. The fame of this edition at length reached England. Mr. Shaw heard of it. He straightway wrote his check for £10 and sent it to Harper & Brothers, with a note saying that as he understood that the first issue of his novel here had not been a conspicuous success, and, as he had had the use of the £10 for more than ten years, he considered it only fair to the publishers to return it. The publishers of Franklin Square at once replied saying that their issue of "Cashel Byron's Profession" was by no means an absolute failure, and adding that they held a draft for £10 subject to the order of the author, or, if he desired, they would contribute it to any charity that he might designate. Mr. Shaw's reply is now awaited. Whatever 'moral' may be drawn from this little tale, one thing is evident: Successful books are not always brought out at propitious times.

LITERARY DISLIKES.

It is not only by our enthusiasms that we know each other and come into sympathy, but by our dislikes. Individual taste if untrained is no sure guide in a library or in an art gallery, but it is at least an index to the natural and acquired powers of its owner, and serves perhaps best in its crude state to tell us whether he is a weak man or a strong, a sentimental man or a man of sense. Taste that has been tried in the fire of experience and has come out pure gold is rare, for where in the beginning the metal had an uncertain ring, too often in the process of refinement its individual qualities are burned away. One comes to like this author for one thing, that author for another, and it is well, for it is proved that one has acquired a breadth of appreciation. But woe to the man who wholly outgrows his antipathies. There should be an undercurrent of predilection in each one of us to make some vice or some ugliness so unendurable that its presence is jarring and repellent, no matter with what beauty it is linked.

As few of us are really educated to the point where taste is tested and either becomes true culture or is lost in a general and indiscriminating effort to appreciate, we have our personal enmities in the world of literature. For instance, one can never know whether a woman will like Kipling or not until she has expressed an opinion, for great as he is the roughness which at times gets the better of his genius puts some minds utterly out of touch with him. They do not understand, they do not sympathise, they find obscurity, daring, and brutality, coarseness even; they miss the power set to rhythm. It is difficult not to be impatient with these people when one has felt Kipling's sway, yet after all, since he has glaring faults, is it not just that sometimes they should stand out conspicuous and overwhelm his fascination? Otherwise his devotees might forget that he is not all ideal.

Fitzgerald is another poet who inspires [illegible] may perplex you. Moreover, there are moods in which to receive him, and scattered through even a favorable year there are days when he angers you.

In current literature, however, there is no quarrel to match the Ibsen quarrel. At the bottom of that stands the question, "What does Ibsen mean?" and on the surface lies the struggle between the beauty and the ugliness that wrestle for mastery in his dramas. Whoever needs to have the awfulness and terror of sins which hide themselves in our society made plain to him cries out that Ibsen is a prophet, branding that others may cleanse, but whoever chafes under the moral and artistic incompleteness of a problem set with no solution offered will rail at Ibsen as a pessimist and a breeder of pessimism.

Only the calm judgment which comes with time and the eliminating process of centuries can entirely settle the worth of varying instincts of taste, and as an individual feeling asserts itself more and more it is no wonder that men like Brunetière call for some trustworthy standard of criticism. Yet taste was planted in man for use, and while none of us wishes to indulge prejudice there are qualities in works of real beauty which arouse a just antipathy, and in learning to be fair and appreciative we must not override the innate sense of unfitness given in different forms and differing measure to us all.

IN PRAISE OF BOOKS.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

I read a book recently from which I gleaned the following exquisite description of books, and thinking it might be worthy of publication, and read with interest by all your readers, (for are we not all lovers of everything that pertains to good literature?) I send it to you, hoping it will lead not a few into the pleasant paths that the writer trod.

Aside from its value as a director to good books, its remarkable and correct use of adjectives is worthy of study by all, especially by those who do not discriminate in their use—and how many of us are not guilty in this respect?

To those who are familiar with the authors mentioned the special applicability of each and every adjective will be thoroughly understood and appreciated. G. W. B.

From "A Club of One."

By A. P. Russell.

My books! What would my life be without them? They are my meat and my drink. They employ my mind and lift me out of myself. In hours of mental exaltation I forget my miserable body. I have a book for every mood and every condition. When my mind is strongest, and clearest, and freest, I range the upper fields of philosophy with Plato; when I am most inclined to pure reason, I listen to brave Socrates; when I am in temper for observation, I read Aesop; when I want to realize the power of light over darkness, I tread the dawn with Epictetus; when I want to breathe the atmosphere of the Caesars, I follow Suetonius; then I walk with Cicero and his nomenclator in the streets of the Eternal City, and study the arts of the Roman politician; of moral exaltation I find a rare example in the heathen Emperor Marcus Antoninus; gods, and demi-gods, and heroes fight for me in Homer; if I want to sup with horrors, I sit down in terror with Aeschylus, witnessing the ghost of Clytemnestra rushing into Apollo's temple, and rousing the sleeping Furies; if I want a refreshing ride in the chariot of the sun, I take a seat with Phaeton, in Ovid; at will, I range paradise with Milton, and explore perdition with Dante; when I hunger for the world and want to see every type of man and woman perfectly represented, I read Shakespeare; when I want to study human nature, I take Don Quixote, Pilgrim's Progress, and Faust; to feel the inspiration of freedom, I scale the heights and storm the fastnesses with Schiller; I gossip with wise old Montaigne; think with Pascal; moralize with Sir Thomas Browne; quote and comment with Burton; rummage with Disraeli; laugh with Rabelais; enjoy the suggestive experiences of Gil Blas; am always amused and entertained with Tristram Shandy; Tom Jones—who could ever tire of it? or of Humphry Clinker? or of Roderick Random? or Swift's Gulliver? though I am terrified sometimes with its pitiless wisdom; I go a-fishing with Izaak Walton, and participate (the slightest) in his meekness and sweet contentment; I listen to sermons from Bourdaloue, and Bossuet, and Massillon, and Barrow, and South, and Chalmers, and Wesley, and Hall; I take down Foster when I want to read a little and think more of times gone by and difficulties overcome; then I philosophize with Souvestre in his Attic; then enjoy the caustic wit and keen satire of Thackeray, and contemplate his immortal creations; then the humanities of Dickens quicken me to tears, and a long procession of the creatures of his teeming brain moves before me; Sir Walter, too, who is history enough for me now; and Burns, the one immortal bard of humanity, to be cherished and sung while man is man, ever and ever; and philosophic Wordsworth; and poetic Shelley and Keats; and the moral and wise Sam Johnson; and the gentle and exquisite Goldsmith; and the storming Carlyle, mighty hater and smiter of cant and shams; then I discourse with Coleridge; pun and turn over rare old books with gentle Elia; luxuriate with abounding Macaulay; dream with De Quincey; expatiate with Hazlitt and Hunt; then to the Brontës, Charlotte especially; then to Miss Austen, so healthy, serene, and pure; then to something more thoughtful again, to Emerson, the reflective, the wise, the exalted, fit society for Plato in the empyrean; then to Hawthorne, dissector, interpenetrator of hearts and lives; to scholarly, witty, shrewd Lowell, critic, poet, and ambassador; to Holmes, so acute, brilliant, suggestive, and philosophical in the Autocrat and Elsie, so master, artist in literature; and when I [illegible] Prue and I; and so I go on and on, feasting with the worthies, and banqueting with the celestials, as inclination or whim pleases me, a precious book, as I said, for every mood and every condition.

Says Americans Ticket Themselves.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

A clever Londoner told me that an American tickets himself with his nationality every time he says "very." "You all say 'vurry,'" he added, "and you all say 'Amurrican.'"

No doubt we are guilty—some of us. Perhaps it is a National trait to do what we do in the easiest way; and it does save an infinitesimal waste of muscular force, a little lingual and labial twist, to say "uh" for "e." And, indeed, any one who harkens well to common speech must have noted this tendency to substitute the "short u" for the "short e." "Wull, it must have been twunty minutes to twulve," is a sentence I caught recently. It is a pretty one!

If this tendency marks a real drift, may we not look on to the day when the "short e" has become a phonetic dodo, extinct, like the "th" in German? For such errors, (I should say, innovations,) with such slang as has won through the struggle for existence, soaks surely upward from stratum to stratum of society, thus evolving the language of daily use.

Some such change has already come to pass. Supposing, to simplify the example, the dialect of London (saturated with cockneyism) to be an unchanging scale or standard; then we have already "urred" from our metewand many a time. We cannot, or do not, say "up," or "house," or "work," like a Londoner, and there is surely no reason why we should worry about it. London may bully our sister republic in Africa, but our vocables are our own! They will crawl into the dictionary at last and become respectable and academic.

It is interesting to see this verbal evolution at work and to wonderingly look forward to the day when all London will be talking avowed cockney, (and proud of it!) all New York, Jimmyfadeneese, and all Boston—but no! it were sacrilege to carry the thought further.

THE NOBBLE DOLLAR AND HIS COUSINS. By Thomas Dunn English. Edited by [illegible]

A New Novel by Gen. Lew Wallace.

Under the above heading the Chicago Times-Herald says: "The English edition of Gen. Lew Wallace's new novel, the scene of which is laid in Mexico, the author's favorite country, the writing of which has been a labor of love, and the publication of which will shortly take form for publication both here and abroad. The author's last American edition of the first book, translated with the author's sanction by Jeremiah Curtin, will be presented immediately by Little, Brown & Co. Mr. Curtin's work as a translator, illustrated through 'Quo Vadis,' 'With Fire and Sword,' 'The Deluge,' and 'Pan-Michael,' needs no comment here. 'The Knights of the Cross' is now running as a serial in Poland. Mr. Curtin has already received from the author the greater part of the second half. The authorized American publishers of the works of this author would warn his admirers here against being deceived by premature, unauthorized, and necessarily incomplete translations. The concluding part of the novel will be published exclusively by Little, Brown & Co. in advance of any other complete publication.

Works of Great Artists.

Masters in Art is the title of a monthly publication that is being issued by the Bates & Guild Company of Boston. It is the object of the series to present half-tone reproductions of the greatest works of the masters, their biographies, critical comments on the paintings reproduced, and other interesting and valuable material. The initial number of Masters in Art is an illustrated monograph on "Anthony Van Dyck." It contains ten plates of his most famous paintings, together with two portraits of the artist himself. There is also a "Life of Van Dyck," and "The Art of Van Dyck," drawn from the criticisms of Fromentin, Carpenter, Hymans, Haslitt, and others. This number also includes a "Van Dyck Bibliography" and a list of the artist's works showing their present location.

What Authors Read.

The Academy of London, according to its annual custom, has sent to a number of well-known men and women, both literary and practical, a request that they would name two books which they had read during the last year with the most interest and pleasure. The answers have just appeared in The Academy. From the list we have taken a few well-known names in literature with their first of the two books mentioned: Thomas Hardy, "Letters of Robert and Mrs. Browning"; Andrew Lang, "Experiences of an Irish R. M."; Edmund Gosse, "The Letters of R. L. Stevenson"; F. Anstey, "Red Pottage"; Maurice Hewlett, "Life and Letters of John Donne"; Mme. Sarah Grand, "The Map of Life"; I. Zangwill, "Wild Animals I Have Known," by Ernest Seton-Thompson, and Ian Maclaren, "David Harum."

Survey of the World's Geography.

Seventy authors, all experts, have collaborated in the production of "The International Geography," which D. Appleton will bring out early in the year. The work will be illustrated by nearly 500 maps and diagrams, which have been specially prepared. It deals with mathematical, physical, biological, political, and commercial geography, and anthropography. The tremendous strides that have been made in the last few years in all these departments will indicate the importance of the work. The discoveries and international treaties, which alone call for a new arrangement of the story of contemporaneous geography, have not been limited to Africa, Asia, or the arctic regions, but even on our own continent the gold of the Klondike has led to a better knowledge of the region, while within a short time we shall have much more exact geographical information concerning the numerous islands which make up the Philippines. The work has been planned and edited by Dr. H. R. Mill, who has also written the chapter on "The United Kingdom."

An Opportunity for Authors Interested in Sierra Leone.

The Board of Education of Sierra Leone has offered a prize of 20 guineas, or a little over $100 in gold, for a small history of that colony, which shall be most suitable as a textbook to be used in the public schools there. The copyright of the successful book is to remain the property of the author, who will derive a revenue from it as long as it continues to be used in the Sierra Leone schools. Manuscripts should not contain more than 75,000 words, and should be sent to the Clerk of the Board of Education, Freetown, Sierra Leone, by July 31, 1900. If no book is approved by the board a prize of £10 will be given to the author of the best, but it will not be published. Further particulars concerning the competition may be obtained from the clerk.

A Tale of Old New York.

Amelia E. Barr's beautifully illustrated "Trinity Bells" has just passed into another edition at J. F. Taylor & Co.'s. The text is set off by sixteen illustrations by C. M. Relyea. The cover design is symbolic of the title of the book. The story, which is a romance of old New York, opens with the return of Catharine van Clyffe from the Moravian School in Bethlehem to New York and her efforts, aided by her brother, to ransom her father, Capt. Jansen Van Clyffe, who had been captured by Tripolitan pirates and held in slavery by the Dey of Algiers. There is love and adventure in the story, which may be said to be sympathetically woven around the music of the bells of old Trinity.

The Independent for 1900.

Owing to certain improvements that have been gradually undertaken by The Independent, this periodical may now reasonably be called a magazine. Its prospectus shows that a special effort is being made on its part to have timely topics of great importance treated of by writers who may be considered as authorities on their separate subjects. The first issue in January of The Independent will contain the annual review of the churches of all denominations. Stanley J. Weyman, for more than thirty years a worker in this field, has written a story of Waterloo, which was just published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It is called "Count Hannibal." It has been the aim of the author to make a strong appeal to every lover and backer of sensational enterprise.

Stevenson's "Letters" are selling in their fifth edition at Charles Scribner's Sons. Other books published by the same house have also gone into new editions. Page's "Santa Claus's Partner" is in its third; Van Dyke's "Fisherman's Luck," in its second; J. C. Harris's "Aunt Minervy Anne," in its third, while Richard Harding Davis's "Lion and Unicorn" has recently passed into its fourth.

Complete editions of "The Education of Mr. Pipp," with four other books by C. D. Gibson published by R. H. Russell have been purchased by E. P. Dutton & Co. and bound by the latter in the most attractive forms. There is one set of Gibson, five volumes, in red polished morocco. Separate éditions de luxe of the volumes are also offered.

"Pike and Cutlass," being a series of hero tales of the United States Navy, by George Gibbs, and illustrated by the author, is being published by the J. B. Lippincott Company.

The American Book Company has just brought out a couple of books which, while designed to be instructive, are particularly appropriate for the New Year. One is "Our Country in Poem and Prose," arranged by Eleanor A. Persons, teacher of history in the Yonkers public schools; the other is "The Baldwin Primer," by May Kirk, with colored illustrations. The first volume contains a collection of bright entertaining material, which is designed to stimulate the pupil's interest in the study of the history of his country. The lessons in "The Baldwin Primer" have been prepared in accordance with the most improved methods of mental science and child study.

Marion Crawford's new novel based on episodes of the Second Crusade, "Via Crucis," has now reached its forty-second thousand. It was published a little over a month ago.

Mr. Charles B. Todd is receiving many letters commending his little book, "A Brief History of the City of New York," recently published by the American Book Company. William Alexander Hoy, who was prominent in the founding of the City History Club, thus writes: "To live in New York and to know of merely its present greatness is like seeing only the last act of a play and remaining ignorant of what has gone before. Yet thousands of good New Yorkers (or are they only half good?) with some pretension to education and culture, know really nothing of their City Mother, her venerable and glorious past, and they will believe the historic fable that the blood of patriots was first shed in Boston, utterly ignorant of history's truth that here in New York fell the first Americans to suffer in liberty's cause. Perhaps, too, such New Yorkers have never learned that New York had a tea party as interesting as that one of which Boston has said so much."

The Doubleday & McClure Company will remove next week from its present quarters, in East Twenty-fifth Street, to 34 Union Square East. It is not yet definitely known when the books issued by this firm will begin to bear the imprint of the new firm's title, "Doubleday, Page & Co."

After the publication of the January number the American edition of The Pall Mall Magazine will be discontinued. The English edition, however, will very likely preserve the large number of readers already gained in this country by the American issue.

A new novel by Dr Mitchell will probably begin its career as a serial in the March number of The Century. It is to be a sort of companion volume to "The Autobiography of a Quack," and will be entitled "Dr. North and His Friends." One who has perused the manuscript calls it "an epitome of the science, culture, and common sense of the nineteenth century."

The author of "The Maternity of Harriot Wicken," Mrs. Henry Dudeney, has just finished another piece of fiction, which Henry Holt & Co. will present in a month or two, under the title of "Folly Corner." It is a character study of love against reason in conflict with love conformable to reason, worked out with all the power of the author's first much-talked-of effort.

"Folk Songs from the Spanish," by Helen Huntington, wife of Archer Huntington, will be presented some time in the coming Spring by G. P. Putnam's Sons. The same house has also in active preparation "The American Business Woman," by John H. Crowell, and "Heredity and Human Progress," by Dr. W. D. McKim. It is in this last volume that the author suggests, as a means of lessening crime in the world, the painlessly putting away of all children of vicious propensities.

"The Life of Abraham Lincoln," by Ida M. Tarbell, will come from the press of the Doubleday & McClure Company Feb. 1. The material of the work is chiefly drawn from special sources, and contains many letters and telegrams hitherto unpublished. The text, which will be fully illustrated, will be presented in two large royal octavo volumes.

"Thackeray's Unidentified Contributions to Punch," compiled by M. H. Spielmann, will come from the press of Harper & Brothers Jan. 16. The book, which will contain between thirty and forty of the great novelist's contributions to the London comic weekly, will be found a most valuable addition to Thackeray literature.

"The First Violin," which Mr. Mansfield has been playing at the Garden Theatre, is based on Miss Fothergill's remarkably successful novel of that name, the only author-

At Milton's Shrine.

A writer in a Columbus (Ohio) newspaper says: "A favored few have worshipped at Milton's shrine the past day or two, as a book cover for his famous 'Defense of Printing' (a reprint of the Grolier Club of New York) was given into the hands of a famous Columbus artist to do with as she pleased, and with a well-sharpened pencil, a tiny needle, and the finest of silks a cover has come forth which will compare with a 'Little Gidding' or those of the noted Mary Collett herself, and the late William Morris may well be proud of his pupil. A miniature of Milton within a frame of gold and turquois forms the centre ornament, supported by the national emblems of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, together with the Milton arms and those of Grolier. Even the weave of the beautiful silk ground is considered, as to its fitness. The coloring and design are Mrs. Bath Merrill's careful production, and the work has partly been done by one of her expert workers at St. Albans Institute, of which she is President. The miniature is a speaking likeness and wonderful as a bit of needle painting, in which one is confined to so many limitations. The cover is for a private collection in New York and will not be duplicated."

A New Periodical.

This month the first number of The Goose Quill, a monthly magazine devoted to literature, will appear in Chicago. From the prospectus the following extracts are presented: "The Goose Quill will not compete with the popular brain-annihilating, insomnia-curing picture Magazines. * * * The Goose Quill will not interest the porkocracy, the plutocracy, or the snobbery." There will be a special department to be called "Rubbish Received," and here trashy novels will be shot or dumped. Though French stories by Guy de Maupassant and Catulle Mendes will be found translated in The Goose Quill, the editor closes its columns to "the white-minded demi-vierges of the yellow aster, purple carrot school." The "Kallyard Klang" is to be tomahawked, for The Goose Quill keeps "young lions" on its staff and they "have claws and know how to use them." The magazine is to print illustrations, some in color, of the leading authors of to-day, and for contributors will have many distinguished English and American writers. Certainly the editor of The Goose Quill, Mr. John Cowley Browne of The London Anti-Philistine, believes that he is thoroughly acquainted with what are the requirements of a Western reading public.

Dangerous Literary Discoveries.

It is a somewhat hazardous business to vouch for "literary discoveries." Simpkin, Marshall & Co., the London publishers, have just brought out with a great flurry of trumpets what purported to be two hitherto unpublished works of Alexandre Dumas, the elder. They are translated by Home Gordon, and are entitled "The Snow on Shah-Dagh" and "Ammalat Bey." The reader is informed in a preface that the precious manuscript came to the translator through the good offices of "a wealthy Greek gentleman, extremely well read," M. Stylianos Apostolides. There is no doubt about the authenticity of the manuscript. But it is a pity that Mr. Gordon should have taken the trouble to decipher the script when he could have read it all in good French print. In the Lévy collection of "Les Oeuvres Completes d'Alexandre Dumas" these two "inédit" tales may be found bearing the titles, respectively, of "La Boule de Neige" and "Sultanetta." Nor is this all. The honest Dumas very clearly indicates in foot notes that they are not original works, but merely translations by him from the Russian—probably from Pushkine and Marlynsky. It is somewhat astonishing that Mr. Gordon should have translated the Dumas manuscript without taking the trouble to look over that author's 297 volumes published in the Lévy collection.

Hataway's Daughter Among Lords.

The few actual facts concerning Shakespeare's life that have come down to us have been made the most of in a volume just issued in Paris from the pen of Georges Duval, entitled "La Vie Véridique de William Shakespeare," ("The True Life of William Shakespeare.") The book opens with the story of the departure of the poet from Stratford-on-Avon after the deer-poaching episode. Says the French biographer: "The inhabitants, upon the threshold of their doors, awaited his passage, in order to wish a pleasant journey to a child of the country, obliged to expatriate himself." Later on Shakespeare's long periods of absence from his family are thus explained: "Compelled to divide his life between work and pleasure, to compete with his rivals, a family would have been a hindrance. Besides, it was necessary for him to associate on intimate terms with such personages as Essex and Southampton, among whom the daughter of M. Hataway would probably have cut rather a poor figure." This is all Publishers' Weekly says: "Many books in the press of the publishers are not announced by the authors. When "Trilby" was published in 1894 the publishers received gold mines in spite of, or because of, the critics. It was translated into [illegible] languages, and had a sympathetic, who, possibly because she knew the English language well and had sympathy with English thought, heartily appreciated on Maurice's meeting. She translated "Trilby" into French. Her work has just been published in Paris. In a brief preface she reproduces the story of the circumstances that moved the artist-author to write "Trilby," and she expresses the hope that her countrymen may come to know the gracious Trilby, and knowing her, learn to love her. The illustrations of the book, the work of M. Fau, show much sensibility, even if they do not always hit off du Maurier's idea.

Miss Cholmondeley's "Red Pottage," published in this country by Harper & Brothers, is now selling in its fifth edition.

By a curious coincidence, the title of the new book by Mme. Sarah Grand is the same as that attached to a novel by "Albert Ross," published in July, 1898, "A New Sensation." This will probably mean that Mrs. Grand's book will have to be brought out in America under a different title.

Mr. Charles George Douglas Roberts, poet, novelist, historian, litterateur, and professor of the English and French literatures, although drawing largely from Canadian sources for his themes, is really better known and more properly appreciated south of the St. Lawrence River than he is north of it. Silver, Burdett & Co. have just taken over a number of his works, which will shortly appear. "By the Marshes of Minos," a volume of Acadian stories, will be published Jan. 2. The new Lippincott's Magazine will present as a serial during the coming year a new romance of wild beast life by Mr. Roberts, entitled "The Heart of the Ancient Wood."

"The Man With the Hoe, and Other Poems," by Edwin Markham, will be presented in England shortly in a copyright edition by Gay & Bird.

Only two copies of "The Soldiers' Catechism," published by Cromwell, are known to be in existence. It was written by the Protector for the use of the Commonwealth Army as a companion to the "Soldiers' Pocket Bible." One of the copies is in the possession of the Rev. Walter Begley, who is about to publish a fac simile of it through Elliot Stock of London, with a short preface written by himself.

A new edition of Thackeray's "English Humorists," edited with an introduction and notes, by Prof. William Lyon Phelps, is in press at Henry Holt & Co.'s.

The second volume of "The History of Trinity Parish," by the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, is almost ready for the press of G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The appearance of the late Gen. Francis A. Walker's "Discussions in Economics and Statistics" has been followed by an increased demand for his work on "International Bimetallism," which the publishers, Henry Holt & Co., are sending to the press for its fifth time.

A collection of short stories by Thomas A. Janvier will soon appear from the press of Harper & Brothers. The collection will include "The Passing of Thomas," "In the St. Peter's Set," and "The Fish of M. Quissard." The same house also promises for early publication a new astronomical romance entitled "The Moon Metal," by Garrett Serviss, and "The Lost Continent," by Cutcliffe Hyne.

It should be stated that although the series, Literatures of the World, edited by Edmund Gosse, is published in England by Heinemann, it is essentially an American work, for the idea of making the collection was conceived by D. Appleton & Co., the american publishers. The next volume published will be the one on "Russian Literature," by R. Waliszewski.

English reviewers acknowledge that they are indirectly indebted to Capt. Mahan, United States Navy, for Sir Herbert Maxwell's "Life of Wellington." "For," says The Academy, "had not Capt. Mahan's 'Life of Nelson' seemed to the publishers to need a companion, this book might never have been written. Thus book begets book."

The Spectator pays American scholarship a certain compliment in heading an article on "Some Recent Economic Literature" with two American books—Mayo-Smith's "Statistics and Economics," published by the Macmillan Company, and Adams's "Science of Finance," which bears the imprint of Henry Holt & Co.

"Present-Day Egypt," by Frederic C. Penfield, published by The Century Company, has just been honored by the Khédive, whose private secretary recently wrote "by command" to the author to say that he [the Khédive] pronounced the work "the only book published on Egypt of today by an author who is thoroughly acquainted with his subject."

Since the publication of "In Hampton Roads," by Rand, McNally & Co., over 10,000 copies of the book have been sold. One strong feature in the story is the graphic description of the battle between the Monitor and the Merrimac.

"Idyls of the Lawn" is the title of a volume containing six of the best short stories from the "University of Virginia Magazine," prefaced by Charles W. Kent, and with designs by Duncan Smith. The book is published by the Stone Printing and Manufacturing Company of Roanoke, Va. The authors represented are Stuart-Monteith Beard, Joseph W. Rice, John Handy Hall, ized edition of which, and the only one containing a glossary of the German phrases and poems, is issued by Henry Holt & Co. In spite of there being several pirated editions in the market, it has passed through over twenty impressions.

"A Man's Woman," by Frank Norris, will shortly be published by the Doubleday & McClure Company.

Among the features of the February Scribner's will be, besides the continuation of Mr. Roosevelt's "Oliver Cromwell," and Mr. Barrie's "Tommy and Grizel," an article, "The Master of Edgewood," on Donald G. Mitchell, by Arthur Reed Kimball, which will deal with the personal side of the venerable "Ik Marvel." There will also be an article on "Social Life in Havana" as it now is under the new régime, by Major T. Bently Mott. The same number will also have a new "O'Connor" story, by William Maynadier Browne, illustrated by A. I. Keller.

On the day after Christmas 410,000 copies of "David Harum" had been sold since the date of publication.

In view of the recent excitement in financial circles, "A Brief History of Panics in the United States," by Juglar, translated by De Courcey Thom, and published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, may prove entertaining reading for some persons.

"Shirley" and "Villette," forming the second and third volumes of the Haworth edition of the "Life and Works of the Brontë Sisters," will be presented in a fortnight by Harper & Brothers. Each volume of this edition has a preface by Mrs. Humphry Ward.

Though Anthony Hope's "Rupert of Hentzau," the romance in which he has perhaps struck his deepest note thus far, was published some eighteen months ago, its popularity remains unabated, and the publishers, Henry Holt & Co., announce that they have just had to send it to press for the tenth time. Of the seven books by this author published by Henry Holt & Co., it is second in popularity only to the "Prisoner of Zenda."

The Ledger Monthly for January has an attractive picture in colors for its cover design. The first article in the number is "Heroes of the Revenue Cutter Service," being a narrative of heroic rescues and daring adventures. A double page is devoted to the reproduction of photographic views of the romantic city of Innsbruck and mountain scenery in the Austrian Tyrol, accompanied by a descriptive article. W. L. Kelley writes about "The Cranberry Harvest of Cape Cod," and there are many other interesting features.

An effort in realism has just come from the press of Street & Smith under the title of "Out of the Past," by Eleanor Hooper Coryell. The story has its beginning in a prologue, in which is described the finding by a Sister of Charity of a dead mother clasping her live infant. There is nothing to show their identity or history.

Lafcadio Hearn's New Book on Japan.*

The real Japan of to-day is very different from the Japan of 1852, when the Perry expedition was undertaken. Then she was barbaric, now she is civilized. The youngest of the new nations of the Far East, she has yet amply manifested her growth in civilization and power in the recent war with her easily vanquished but huge Chinese rival, and the end of her achievement is not yet. Her rise and progress has, indeed, been marvelous and full of inspiration, but it has not been with topics such as these that Lafcadio Hearn has concerned himself in his new volume, "In Ghostly Japan."

He has instead turned aside to write of Japan in other ways and for other than merely historic reasons. The result has been a masterly consideration and an admirable treatment of the myth, folk-lore, poetry, and story of Japan. In his hands one realizes as never before that the land of the cherry and plum blossom and of the chrysanthemum, like all Oriental countries, is filled with legend quite in striking contrast with Western romance. Much of this has heretofore been lost, however, to the ordinary student because of a lack of the intimate association with the natives from which alone comes the knowledge required to fully grasp and understand the Japanese thought, habit, character, and art, lacking which the living story at best is dead.

Those to whom Japan is known only through hearsay or the printed page can but dimly realize the Japanese atmosphere and the striking local color that Mr. Hearn introduces into the story that he tells of the empire of the Mikado and in his recounting of her myths and legends.

Perhaps one of the first things that will be noticed upon the traveler's arrival in Japan and during his first day there will be the incense that forms the basis for the faint but never-to-be-forgotten odor of the Far East. It haunts the dwelling house, not less than the temple. In the houses of the high and low and wherever Buddhism lives, there is incense. Its use enters into, but is not confined to, religious rites and ceremonies; indeed, the costlier kinds of it are chiefly manufactured for social entertainments. Incense burning has been an amusement of the aristocracy of Japan ever since the thirteenth century. Games in which the identification of as many as ten varieties of incense forms the basis of competition are exceedingly popular, and the cultivation of the often neglected smelling power is carried to a degree entirely unknown to us.

A certain charm and picturesqueness belong to all things Japanese. This applies to the scenery, the buildings, the native kurumas, (vehicles,) the dwarf trees, the junks, occupations, everything in all bamboo land. Divination flourishes, and, according to the present book, attains as results wonders before which our palmists and clairvoyants are as nothing. Weird tales of divination lend to the book much of charm that were otherwise wanting. Seldom, indeed, is it that so entirely new a field is opened before us as is the case "In Ghostly Japan." The study presented in Japanese folk-lore is particularly notable, and in the chapters on silkworms, a Passional Karma, and an introduced "Peony Lantern," Footprints of the Buddha, and Ululation. Many interesting Eastern legends are collected, and to many will have the charm of absolute novelty.

The bits of poetry and the various examples cited sharply contrast with Occidental verse, but without some knowledge of the Japanese will not secure the consideration to which they are entitled. Poetry in Japan is universal as the air. It is felt by everybody. It is read by everybody. It is composed by almost everybody—irrespective of class and condition. It is everwhere to be heard by the ear and seen by the eye. As for audible poetry, wherever there is working there is singing. The toil of the fields and the labor of the streets are performed to the rhythm of chanted verse. Visible poetry appears everywhere, written or graven, as a form of decoration. Poems can be found upon almost any kind of domestic utensil—for example, upon braziers, iron kettles, vases, wooden trays, lacquer ware, porcelains, chopsticks of the finer sort, even toothpicks! Poems are printed upon towels, draperies, curtains, kerchiefs, silk linings, and women's crêpe silk underwear. Poems are stamped or worked upon letter paper, envelopes, purses, mirror cases, traveling bags. Poems are inlaid upon enameled ware, cut upon bronzes, graven upon metal pipes, and embroidered upon tobacco pouches. At social gatherings it is the custom to compose verses and to suspend the compositions to blossoming trees. Short poems are written in Japan as a moral duty. Are you very angry? Do not say anything unkind, but compose a poem. Is your best beloved dead? Do not yield to useless grief, but try to calm your mind by making a poem. Whenever injustice or misfortune disturbs you, put aside your resentment or your sorrow as soon as possible and write a few lines of sober and elegant verse for a moral exercise.

The poet in Japan secures a glad hand and a respectful hearing. The book is well named, and will be eagerly read by those interested in ghostly story forms.

The Puritan Exalted.*

Mr. Daniel Walt Howe, in his volume, resents that modern feeling regarding Puritans and Puritanism, as expressed by that somewhat flippant phrase, "Let us thank God for having given us such ancestors, and let each successive generation thank Him not less fervently for being one step further away from them, in the march of ages." It is this want of reverence which Mr. Howe decries. He deems it his duty to rehabilitate the worthies of the past, and perhaps led by kindly impulses, his tendency is in the direction of their overglorification. This backsliding, he thinks, is of a comparatively modern origin, and Mr. Fisk is held among the early offenders. Prior to 1836 "ancestral worship," so far as New England was concerned, when treating of the Commonwealth period, was much in vogue. Then, in 1886, there was Mr. Brook Adams's "The Emancipation of Massachusetts." Between two particular authors, writes Mr. Howe, the difference is that, while one "hated all Puritans alike," the latter's animosity is directed "principally against the ministers, whom he styles as priests." Then there is another offender, Mr. Hollowell. What right had he to espouse the cause of the Quakers, and recite all over again the story of their cruel treatment? There is one expression of Mr. Charles Adams found in his "Massachusetts: Its Historians and Its History," which particularly incenses Mr. Howe. Mr. Adams describes accurately a period as the "theological glacial period," or "ice age." He, too, our author declares, shows his animus by calling the ancestor worship as belonging to the "filio-piestistic" school.

What Mr. Howe is intent on accomplishing is to describe the public and private life of the Puritans, "their customs, their struggles to establish and maintain themselves against so many odds in this remote section of the world." Mr. Howe cites the well-known story of Oliver Cromwell, when he sat for his portrait. The Lord Protector said to the artist, "Paint me, warts and all." Certainly there were many warts on faces, Roundhead or Cavalier. Readers wanting in reverence might declare that the writer of "The Puritan Republic" was somewhat inclined to enlarge the warts on the faces of all those who ran counter to the Puritan fathers.

Mr. Howe begins with the account of John White of Dorooby, the departure for Holland, the settlement of the colony, the trouble with the Indians, the social, industrial, commercial life, the Puritan Sabbath, education, books, literature, the rise and fall of theocracy, and the passing away of the Puritan.

Our author stands up nobly for Norton and Endicott, though Mr. Fiske declares them to have been "two as arrant fanatics as ever drew breath." Particular arguments made in favor of fanatics are as applicable to the Mahdi as to John Brown. Mr. Howe writes "that Endicott and his fellow-Puritans committed a grievous mistake in their persecution of the Quakers and the Quakeresses is a proposition that

CONTENTS: Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

No problem possesses more interest for men than that contained in the question asked centuries ago. "If a man die, shall he live again?" The orthodox Christian believes it to be the gift of God through the atoning sacrifice of Christ. Others seek a scientific demonstration. To the former class Dr. Savage's volume will not appeal, but to the latter group his book will be welcomed as a valuable contribution to the knowledge on this great question.

This is the author's strongest, most philosophical book. It is broader, more fundamental than the previous volumes. It replies to criticisms, and contains advanced views and doctrines which are in some sense a departure from the teaching of the earlier volumes. It considers also the social problem, and aims to harmonize the truth contained in present-day theories of individualism and socialism.

CUBA.

Valuable Impressions Obtained During a Residence of Two Years.*

One of the most valuable books on Cuba which we have yet received is Charles M. Pepper's "To-morrow in Cuba." Under this title the impressions of over two years of residence in Cuba as a newspaper correspondent are set forth in a comprehensive narrative. The observations here recorded commenced in the Spring of 1897 and cover the eventful period of recent Cuban history. The author disclaims any intention of supporting preconceived opinions or of defending any special policy. It is his aim to set forth the facts on which he has based his views of the situation in Cuba. In his estimation the problems of Cuba cannot be settled from without. An Italian statesman's utterance may be paraphrased, "Cuba is made, but who shall make the Cubans?" The author's answer is, "Themselves." The conditions under which this task is to be accomplished will be better appreciated after a careful perusal of the present volume. It familiarizes the reader with the surroundings in which the problem of Cuban regeneration and development are to be realized.

The early portions of the work are devoted to a review of the history of Cuba from the commencement of the ten years' war to the end of the autonomous constitution put into effect by Captain General Blanco. With this portion of the volume, or the part devoted to the Spanish civil government as illustrated in Cuba, it is not our intention to deal. These features have been carefully considered by the author, and an acquaintance with them is most desirable in solving the problem of Cuba's future. The chapters on the condition of trade and taxation, railways and internal development, products, immigration and colonization, the race of color, religion, and manners and morals appeal to us as forming the most unique and valuable passages of this scholarly work. This notice will touch more particularly on some of the social and economical conditions and problems referred to in the latter divisions. The American military government of the island must end sooner or later. How to best time this and provide for the exigencies that will arise after such a change will be better understood by reading Mr. Pepper's useful volume.

By the royal decree of 1878 the provinces of Cuba were fixed as they exist to-day, the division being into six civil jurisdictions. Suggestions have been made of reorganizing these provincial boundaries, or consolidating them so as to establish eastern, western, and central provinces; but the six divisions will probably exist in the future as they now stand. Uniform laws for the whole island will obviate the necessity of provincial law making, leaving to a central legislative body the work of providing governing statutes for all of Cuba. In discussing the future of the island a most important factor is the mixed population. As the author says:

> The existence of the blacks must be reckoned with in every phase of the reconstruction of the island. Consequently their standing and their prospects are now discussed with the simple reminder that Cuba has social and economic problems to solve as well as political ones. The African population has a defined status socially, industrially, and politically. The black race has no future separate from that of Cuba. It is essentially and integrally a part of that future. The negro or the mulatto may call himself "Don" and ask that others use the prefix in addressing him. This is more than the simple "Mister" of American familiarity. "Señor" answers to that meaning. "Don" is the "Esquire," the old English designation for gentleman, the title of courtesy, and it is translated by the dictionaries as the Spanish name for gentleman. The colored man is not simply Señor So and So; he is Señor Don So and So. The prefix was the possession of the proudest grandees of Spain, and it is still supposed to carry with it a certain dignity. * * * And under the Spanish law, by formal resolution of a Captain General, the humblest negro in Cuba was decreed as rightfully using the same prefix.

By royal decrees promulgated in 1885 and 1893 the negro not only obtained the authorization to use the title of "Don," but also secured equal rights with the white classes affirming to them the full privileges of hotels and railways. These decrees are strictly enforced, and the American military authorities have shown a scrupulous regard for the civil rights of the black. The author estimates that 30 per cent. of the population is black and 70 per cent. of white blood. The negro laborer is best suited to the sugar plantations, fully one-half of the laborers in the canefields being black. Under sympathetic management the colored race is fairly industrious. In Cuba the negro women do not work in the fields as in Jamaica, certainly a great advance in their condition. In the author's estimation, the Cuban negro is decidedly on a higher plane in the industrial life of the towns and cities than is his brother in the United States. In the cigar factories of Havana they work at the same bench and receive the same pay as the whites, and this is the same in other trades. Unless an overwhelming wave of Americanism, with race prejudice on the crest, sets in, the future opportunities will continue the same as in the present. Antonio Maceo was a type of the Cuban black who fought for the extermination of the Spanish rule. It is related that the Spanish authorities of Havana sent up rockets as signals of rejoicing when the news came that he had fallen at Punta Brava. In him was the military potencies of the African race, and the author believes that the negroes have established their political and social standing in Cuba for all time to come.

In the chapter devoted to immigration and colonization we have a very clear outline of the growth of the population of the island through those channels. The recent discussion of the question of the acclimatization of the white man in the equatorial regions and in the border tropics is epitomized in a skillful manner. The Chinese immigration question developed about as many interesting features in Cuba as in the United States. They were as a class neutral during the insurrection and suffered greatly, their numbers having dwindled from 43,000 to about 20,000. According to the author, the hope of Cuba for to-morrow lies only in immigration that is based on the family, and for that reason Chinese colonization of Cuba on a grand scale will be discouraged. The future of Cuba lies in the development of its sugar, tobacco, and coffee plantations and the exploitation of its mineral and timber wealth. For this purpose intelligent labor will be necessary. Where the needed supply is to come from is a difficult problem to solve.

The morals of Cuba are no better and no worse than those of other countries within the geographical zone of supposed contamination. Havana is the Paris of the West Indies. Its immorality is worn on its sleeve. The American visitor may read in the newspapers municipal orders about the locating and regulating of the houses of tolerancy, their licensing, and medical inspection. The American military authorities accepted the system as they found it, which was a measure of hygiene and not of reformation. But Havana must not be taken as a type of the whole island. The country is seen to better advantage. There the virtues of the people are not observed by the vices of the individuals.

In the final chapter the author discusses the question of the transition from American military rule to the something else which is to succeed it. To decide what that something else shall be will require most careful thought to determine. It will be necessary to ascertain the will of the people, and the author thinks the first question to submit to them is that of annexation. His conviction is that while the overwhelming majority of the Cuban people are not thinking of early annexation, they are not in a hurry to cut themselves adrift. The Cubans would very likely demand and accept nothing less than Statehood as a condition to their joining the United States. The American people have great faith in the capacity of the Cubans to work out their own destiny as a people, and, with the determination to encourage them, it is doubtful whether our citizens are ready to share with them the full glory of American institutions. The Cuban people want to try the experiment of nationality, separate and distinct, with all its perils, and they must be allowed to try it. A trial of self-government will satisfy them, and if it does not prove to their liking, maybe it will not be too late for the United States to assume a protectorate over the island or admit it as a part of the Union.

Mr. Pepper's book is worthy of the widest circulation. It is a masterly work, replete with interesting information and invaluable to all students of the Cuban question.

Questions and Answers.

Arthur Simmons, Mount Vernon, N. Y.: "When did the Middle Ages begin and end?"

According to Hallam, the Middle Ages form a period of 1,000 years, beginning with the establishment of the Frankish kingdom in Gaul, under Clovis, and ending with the invasion of Italy by Charles VIII. of France in 1494. When mediæval literature is considered, however, this period can be extended to 1519, when Maximilian I. died, and even to the fall of Bayard in 1524.

"S. W. S.," New York City: "What is the value of a Latin breviary, Venice, 1398, in pigskin, with brass clasps, containing five woodcuts and in perfect condition?"

Liturgical literature has not the value it is commonly supposed to possess, and while this breviary is undoubtedly rare, its value at auction might be considerably under $35.

J. T. Murphy, Woodlawn Heights, New York City: "What is the address of The Collector and Art Critic?"

13 West Twenty-eighth Street.

"F. K.," Elizabeth, N. J.: "In your issue of Dec. 16, Walter Malone, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, inquires for the authorship of 'Proserpine to Pluto in Hades.' If in good condition, about $25.

Miss G. A. Davis, West New Brighton, Staten Island, N. Y.: "Can any one give me the translation of the poem 'Carcassone,' whose author I have forgotten, but who is one well known to readers of French literature?"

The item recently printed in this column, asking for illustrations from magazines for a little girl who is an invalid and amuses herself with a scrap book, gave, by mistake, in connection with the matter, the name of E. M. Cummings.

JEWS IN NEW YORK.

How They First Came in the Time of the Dutch—Results Due to Their Expulsion from Spain.

From Volume II. of Irma Fisher's "Dutch and Quaker Colonies in America."

The City of New York has always been the principal home of the Jews of the United States, and it was in connection with the Dutch enterprise in founding New Netherland that they were first brought here. It was from various quarters, but mainly from the Spanish Peninsula, that they had come to Holland. In all the history of this wonderful people there is no more brilliant chapter than that of their career in Spain under the Mohammedan dynasties between the tenth and fourteenth centuries. In point of civilization, when Philip Augustus and the lion-hearted Richard went together on their crusade, such cities as Toledo and Cordova were as far in advance of London and Paris as London and Paris are now in advance of Toledo and Cordova, and in this Spanish pre-eminence the Jews played a foremost part. Such men as Ibn Gebirol and Maimonides were the great teachers of their time, and influences wafted across the Pyrenees had much to do with the Albigensian culture in Southern France. As the Christians in Spain slowly conquered and drove back the Mussulmans, the persecution of Jews began, and steadily increased in virulence, until the year 1492, which witnessed the surrender of Grenada and downfall of the last Moorish kingdom, saw also the abominable edict which drove from their homes and their native land 200,000 honest and industrious Spanish citizens of Hebrew race and faith. In that eventful year, when an inscrutable Providence put into the hands of Spain the rich prize of America, did she enter upon that course of wholesale persecution which drove her to be unworthy of such opportunities and incapable of using them. The cost of Columbus's second voyage was partly defrayed with stolen money, the property of Jews who had been dragged on shipboard and carried over to Morocco. Meanwhile several industries received a deathblow, and in particular many cities were left without a single physician or any person qualified to act as notary public. But the edict of 1492, savagely as it was executed, did not suffice to remove all Jews, and for the next century a large part of the work of the Inquisition consisted in burning them and seizing their goods.

The revolt of the Netherlands gave them an opportunity for emigration, of which they were not slow to avail themselves, and by the end of the sixteenth century they were to be found in all cities in Holland, especially in Amsterdam, whereby Andrew Marvel was provoked to write a poem in which that city is said to have its "bank of conscience" where "all opinions find credit and exchange"; "yea," continues the poet, with what is meant for withering sarcasm:

> "The universal Church is only there."

Among these settlers in Holland were some from Poland and Germany, but the great majority were from the Spanish Peninsula, and some of the most highly cultivated of these were Portuguese. Of such parents was born at Amsterdam, in 1632, Benedict Spinoza, one of the most exalted names in all the history of human thought and human character.

In Holland, as usual, many of the Jews were bankers. They were liberal subscribers to the stock of the West India Company, and there were several Hebrew names on the list of Directors. When the Dutch took possession of Brazil in 1624, a party of Jews went over and settled there; but in 1645 the Portuguese rose against the Dutch, and after nine years of desultory fighting compelled them to sign a treaty, in which they gave up all claim to the country. As for the resident Jews, the Portuguese agreed to give them an "amnesty, in all wherein they could promise it"—too vague an assurance to be very assuring. In the Autumn of that year, 1654, the bark Santa Caterina arrived in New Amsterdam from Brazil, with twenty-seven Portuguese Jews on board, men, women, and children. They had apparently embarked in haste, taking such effects as they could, for upon their arrival at Manhattan the skipper sold all their goods at public auction to pay for their passage. Another party soon came from the Dutch Island of Curaçao. These arrivals did not please Director Stuyvesant, who wrote home to the company, begging that "none of the Jewish Nation be permitted to infest New Netherland." Before getting an answer he contrived to annoy the new-comers so that some went to Newport, feeling sure of toleration there, while others staid at Manhattan, in the hope of being set right by the company's orders. In that hope they were not disappointed. The company replied to Stuyvesant that his request was "inconsistent with reason and justice," and the States General followed this up with the act of July 15, 1655, "expressly permitting the Jews to trade in New Netherland, and to reside there on the simple condition that they should support their own poor." This condition has been well fulfilled, for such a kind of person as a Jewish pauper has seldom been seen.

The incidents here recounted were the beginnings of thrifty and valuable Jewish settlements in New York and Rhode Island. After the English conquest of New Netherland the Duke of York was led, as we have seen, by considerations of expediency, to continue the liberal policy of the Dutch. The instructions to Gov. Andros, on his first coming, were to give full toleration to persons "of what religion soever," but perhaps the failure to exclude Jews may have have been due to oversight; for this clause was omitted from the instructions to Gov. Dongan, and when, in 1685, the Jewish residents in New Amsterdam petitioned for leave to build a synagogue he referred the petition to the Mayor and Common Council, who refused to grant it, on the ground that toleration of public worship extended only to sects professing faith in Christ. But Dongan, himself an Irish Catholic, was a man of extremely liberal views. Next year, whether at his own instance or not, a fresh set of instructions was sent him, in which the omitted clause was restored. Probably Dongan took advantage of this to grant the Jews' petition, for neither Andros, who came back as his successor, nor Leisler, was at all likely to take such a step; and we know that in 1691 the Jews had a place for public worship. In 1695 there were twenty families, or probably about 100 souls, in the city, and their little synagogue stood on the south side of the present Beaver Street, midway between Broadway and Broad Street. In 1712 an English clergyman informs us that one can learn Hebrew in New York as easily as in Europe, because of divers ingenious and learned men of that nation that dwell there. In 1748 the Swedish traveler, Peter Kalm, tells of the fine shops, the large country estates, and the richly freighted ships belonging to the Jews whom he visited in New York. At that time they possessed all civil rights and privileges in common with the other inhabitants, except that of voting for members of the Legislature.

More Dutch Nursery Rhymes.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

A few weeks ago I noticed in a SATURDAY REVIEW Mr. van Sicklen's "Trip a trop a troontjes," and in THE REVIEW of Nov. 4 I see that Mr. F. Vroom thinks a few more Dutch nursery rhymes would be appreciated. While reading this the nursery rhymes began to bubble up in my memory, so I set to work to write them down. I have never seen them in print, but remember hearing my grandmother sing them while she trotted me up and down on her knee sixty years ago in Holland. I was four years old then, and although so long ago, I remember it as if it happened only two weeks ago.

"The Absent Minded Beggar" in Italian.

A recent number of Caffaro of Genoa contains a curiously literal rendering in Italian of Rudyard Kipling's poem, "The Absent-Minded Beggar." It is entitled "Il Mendicante Distratto." It will be seen that even in the title the spirit of the words has been lost, for although "distratto" is good enough for "absent-minded," "mendicante" signifies "beggar" in the most literal sense—a mere taker of alms. There are other funny things in the body of the poem itself. "Son of a Lambeth publican" is translated "Figlio d'un liquorista di Lambeth," while an asterisk referring to a note at the foot of the poem tells us that the liquor dealer's son is no other than "Paolo Krüger" himself.

There is some dispute among London literary journals as to whether the sum (£7175) paid Mr. Kipling for the poem was the greatest ever given for a piece of verse. In a sort of indirect way the largest sum paid for a single poem was £8,000, given for a jeu d'esprit of eight lines written by James Smith, one of the authors of the famous "Rejected Addresses." Smith happened to meet Mr. Strachan, the King's printer, at a dinner party, and found him suffering from gout. In spite of this, the old gentleman enjoyed Smith's brilliant conversation extremely. Next day the author sent eight lines of verse to Strachan, who was so pleased with them that he added a codicil to his will the same day, leaving the author the sum of £8,000. Of course, this is the case of a man

HUDSON'S BAY.

A Great and Romantic Story of Trade in That Country.*

In the far distant northern country these three letters, "H. B. C.," have been blazed on many a tree, cut into many a rock, and Indian and white man have respected them, for these letters stand for the Hudson's Bay Company. Mr. Beckles Wilson gives the history of "the Honorable Company of the Merchant Adventurers trading into Hudson's Bay," and a very interesting and curious story it makes. As Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal puts it, here is an immense area of country "more than half as large as Europe over which its control is eventually extended."

The methods of the Hudson's Bay Company, tending toward the occupation of the country, were in opposition to other ways, for first came the trader, then the soldier, and the missionary last. At least the Scotchman or the Englishman was no hypocrite. And how was this vast territory held? By dealing honestly with the Indians. If physical force was necessary to squelch an Indian outrage, action was immediate. The rules and regulations of the Hudson's Bay Company were just, founded on good sense, and the red man had no grievance, because he felt that the law was the same for him as for the white man.

"Search all Europe and Asia and you will find no parallel to the present sway of the company, for it feeds and clothes, amuses and instructs, as well as rules nine-tenths of its subjects, from the Eskimo tribes of Ungara to the Loucheaux at Fort Simpson, thousands of miles away."

The origin of the company is a curious one. With the restoration of the Stuarts, English mercantile spirit began to make itself felt. In the Court there were many claimants for favors. The King was beset with petitioners. Everybody wanted grants, charters, patents. There were "returned freebooters, buccaneers in embryo, upstarts and company promoters." The East India Company held the Orient, but in the West there was a chance for enterprise. New Amsterdam the English had wrested from the Dutch, and then some part of the fur trade found its way to England. In Canada the French had so far secured the larger portion of the peltries. Skins of the fox, marten, and beaver were a French monopoly. The business of the Canadian trapper suffered from official intrigue. The colonial policy of France always has been one of interference.

In 1666 there were two men, employes of a company in France, known then as the "Compagnie des Cents Associé." These two men proposed a scheme "for the extension of the fur trade." The fur-bearing animals they knew could be taken in large numbers at or near Hudson's Bay. Groseilliers and Radisson, so they were called, went to England and sought aid there. Groseilliers's real name was Medard Chouart, and he had emigrated to Quebec when he was a lad. He was the most adventurous of men. "Des Groseilliers" was a name he had taken from a small estate of his in France. Radisson was his superior in education. He was a Huguenot, and had been driven out of France. Both these men were typical adventurers. Groseilliers went to Boston to lay his plans before the colonists, but the means were not procurable. In 1665 the two adventurers sailed for Plymouth, England, and from there went to France. They received no encouragement there. A letter is extant of a Col. Carr, then in Paris, who wrote to Lord Arlington. "Having heard by the French in New England of a great traffic in beavers * * * and, having had proof of the assertion," Carr concludes that the best thing to do is to send the men to England. Radisson remained in Paris and Groseilliers went to London.

Rupert, Prince of England and Bohemia, was a rash soldier with an artistic temperament, and always in want of money. Charles II. was evidently looking around so as to find some good thing for Prince Rupert. In 1667 Lord Preston informed Rupert of the visit of Groseilliers and the Frenchman's business. After a while the Prince promised Groseilliers to become the patron of the company with its fur-acquiring scheme. In June, 1668, a fifty-ton ketch, the Nonsuch, was fitted out, and left the Thames for parts unknown. Groseilliers was on board. It was a bold voyage. Hudson's Strait was reached and a landing made Sept. 29, on a river, which was named Rupert's River. A fort was built. The Winters of 1668-69 dragged their slow lengths along. Groseilliers showed much discretion in his management of the Indians. He explained how much more advantageous it would be for the Indians to trade with the English than with the French. Plenty of furs came in. In June there was a cargo of furs, and the little vessel left for England. Groseilliers remained in his fort. The Nonsuch arrived in the Thames in August. After some delay a charter was granted to Prince Rupert and seventeen other noblemen and gentlemen, "with the exclusive rights to establish settlements and to carry on trade at Hudson's Bay."

The 17th of November, 1671, is memorable in the annals of the Hudson's Bay Company. On that day there was posted up at Garraway's coffee house, in London, the following announcement: "On the 5th of December, ensuing, There will be sold in the Great Hall of the Place 2,000 weight of Beaver Skins, comprised in thirty lotts, belonging to the Honourable, the Governor and

"We cannot urge the attention of teachers to it too strongly as a means of supplementary reading."—School Educator, Rochester, Minn.

EDUCATIONAL FEATURES OF ST. NICHOLAS FOR 1900

Nature and Science for Young Folks.

Beginning with the January, 1900, number, St. Nicholas will devote space to a new department in which the fascinating facts of natural science will be clearly presented by Mr. Edward F. Bigelow, A. M., editor of "Popular Science."

Mr. Bigelow has been for ten years a teacher. He believes in taking a child first to nature, and he supplements school-room education by taking the pupils out into the woods and fields. Mr. Bigelow's pages in St. Nicholas will include a department in which he will answer for the young folk any questions that may be put to him.

Out-of-Door Schools

is the subject of a fully illustrated article in the January number of St. Nicholas describing the work done in Washington, D. C., where classes study plants, government, geography, science and art in the parks, fields, libraries, and public buildings of the city.

The St. Nicholas League

is a successful new department,—an organization of the readers of St. Nicholas which stands for intellectual advancement and for higher ideals of life, for intelligent patriotism and for protection of dumb animals, etc. Prizes are offered for original compositions, drawings and photographs, and it is believed that the League will become a great educational factor.

The Program of St. Nicholas was never better than this year. There will be ten long stories, each complete in a single number, contributed by well-known writers, with serial stories, articles on American history by Elbridge S. Brooks, and contributions from Theodore Roosevelt, John Burroughs, Ian Maclaren, etc.

THE NEW VOLUME begins with November, and after the issue of the January number (December 25th) the November and December numbers will be given free of charge to new subscribers who subscribe for one year beginning with January. Subscription price, $3.00 a year.

THE CENTURY CO. UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

Company of Merchant Adventurers, Trading in Hudson's Bay." Before this all furs worn by the better classes were dressed in Leipsic, Amsterdam, Paris, and Vienna. Now began the preparation of peltries in England. This first sale of furs "was the beginning of that series of great transactions which during two centuries have made London the centre of the world's fur trade." If might have been Dryden who wrote these lines in 1672:

"Friend, once 'twas Fame that led thee forth
To brave the Tropic Heat, the Frozen North.
Late it was Gold, then Beauty was the Spur,
But now our Gallants venture but for Fur."

The rest of the history of the company follows the general lines of history. As to particular methods, these have been within the wise rules of English colonization, and so the title of "Honourable Company" has been most honorably earned. We conclude with Lord Strathcona's impressive words, "It is probable a day is at hand when this area will be dotted with farms and villages and cities, a time when the forests will be uprooted and the plains of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory tilled by the husbandman, its hills and valleys exploited by the miner, yet certain spots in this vast region must ever bear testimony to the hunter of furs. Remote, solitary, often hungry, and not seldom frozen, the indomitable servant of the Great Fur Company lived his life and gave his name to mountain, lake, and river."

Jolly Sea Yarns.*

A family inheritance is a fighting capacity at sea, and that Norseman trait we get straight from England. "Naval Yarns," telling of sea combats, of wrecks, of acts of gallantry, all the way back from 1616, as recounted by "Men of Wars Men," is to be found in the volume. There was the ship "Dolphin, of 220 tons or thereabouts," and she sailed out of Zante, bound for London, in 1616. Her armament consisted of "nineteen pieces of cast ordnance and five murtherers." She had for crew thirty-six men and two boys. She met five Turkish men of war, and, though the Turks "sounded their trumpets," the Dolphin whipped the whole lot of them. Whoever wrote the "Seaman's Grammar," if he was Capt. John Smith, was all on fire with naval ardor. We quote a passage which has a modern Kingsley manner. The Spaniard has been whipped. The Captain gives his orders.

Chirurgeon looks to the wounded and winde up the slaine with each a bullet or weight at their heads and feet to make them sinke; and give them three guniues for their funeral. Boteliers make clean the ship. * * * Boy, fetch my cellar of bottles; a health to yon all fore and aft. Courage my hearts! Mainetopmen, see the tops and yards well manned with pikemen, firepots and brasse bates. * * * So sound drums and trumpets and Saint George for England.

"What Mad Montague Did" is one of the old stories the English tar still tells. The Hon. Capt. William Montague, who commanded a ship when Lord Anson wiped out M. de Jonquière's fleet, was certainly crack-brained. Once he tackled a French ship very much superior in size and armament to his own, and he made the Frenchman fast. "D— you," cried Montague, "if you don't strike directly I will blow both ships up, and we will all go to h— together." These words were so impressive and wanting in politeness that the Frenchman struck his colors. Once in a row at Lisbon Mad Montague had a black eye. Leaving his ship, he compelled each of his boat's crew to black with cork one of his eyes so as to resemble a natural injury; the starboard rowers the right eye, the larboard rowers the left, and the coxswain both.

"The Journal of a Naval Surgeon, 1758-1763," is most curious. Things on shipboard have been very much changed, and for the better, since those days. The surgeon tells how Admiral Hawke, when the crew were all ill with the putrid fever, dosed them with James's powder, and so killed many a poor fellow. Some of the sailors' letters of 1740, stated to be authentic, are of the most amusing character, as

Our dear cok, of an admiral has the English blood in his vains—and by G— we will support our King and country as long as a drop of blood remains. * * * As for the privateers, we have taken a dosen. Damn the French. Drink, dear brother, for we dress mutton with claret.

The surgeon tells of the capture of many French vessels laden with wine, and the Admiral's orders that the casks should be distributed among the captors. The men of the King's ship has a pint of wine per man per day, in lieu of small grog or beer, and the officers their claret for the asking.

"Naval Yarns" is a jolly book fitted for the fo'castle, for the reason that the sailor of a hundred years ago was not precisely polished, but was given to rather broad language. The volume is a handsome one and fully illustrated.

"Dutch Courage."

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The writer of the communication under the above caption, which appears in your interesting issue of Dec. 23, will, doubtless be interested in the following extract from Chapter lv. of Marryat's "Peter Simple":

"Shall I give them their grog now, Sir?" said I to the Captain; 'they must want it."

"No, no," replied the Captain; "no, no, Mr. Simple, I don't like what you call Dutch courage."

* * * * * * *

"I think, Sir," observed I, "that it is an injustice to this fine ship's company to jest at their receiving Dutch courage." (Dutch courage is a term for courage screwed up by drinking freely.)

So "Dutch courage" was prevented when hoisted the flag of Walter Scott.

[illegible] are to judge what are the actual [illegible] the published volume of Memoirs of a Revolutionist,* all written by Prince Kropotkin. The social question [illegible] the world, and it has for its basis a general proposition that all men are born free and equal. The first premise must be granted, but the second, never, for, alas! God in His infinite wisdom does not give to [illegible] the same brains, or the identical [illegible] structure. Then, in studying the [illegible] character of the volume, written [illegible] honestly, it should be borne in mind that [illegible] emanates from a source absolutely alien [illegible] our race and civilization. A Russian, to [illegible] it in a comic way, is not a German, an American, or an Englishman. Racial instincts differ. Such drastic methods as are suggested by Prince Kropotkin might be advantageous in the domain of the Czar and be the cause of ruin in other countries.

Prince Kropotkin is singularly impersonal, and that has its merit, but his ends and aims are as seemingly vague as they are impossible. There are many contradictions. The author of the volume would not kill a fly, and yet he advocates the extermination of those opposed to his theories. As Mr. Courténey expresses it, Tolstoi, the dreamer, believes that, through religion and the teaching of the Gospel the whole world will be saved. He eliminates the question of time. Kropotkin is not afraid of violence. He is "on amicable terms with the extreme section of Nihilism." Contrasting Tolstoi and Kropotkin, the first may believe that by the means of pure literature he will change the status of the world, the latter thinks the betterment of mankind will come about by the study of science. Both these men early in their lives were in revolt with their surroundings. Kropotkin and Tolstoi were of the nobility, and were born when Nicholas of unhappy memory was Emperor. Mr. Brandes, in his preface, writes of Kropotkin:

> He has lived the life of the aristocrat and the worker; he has been one of the Emperor's pages and a poverty-stricken writer; he has lived the life of the student, the officer, the man of science, the explorer of unknown lands, the administrator, and the hunted revolutionist. In exile he has had at times to live upon bread and tea as a Russian peasant; and he has been exposed to espionage and assassination plots like a Russian Emperor.

Born in Moscow, Kropotkin draws this picture of his home:

> In these quiet streets, far away from the noise and bustle of the commercial Moscow, all the houses had much the same appearance. They were mostly built of wood, with bright green sheet-iron roofs, the exteriors stuccoed and decorated with columns and porticoes; all were painted in gay colors. Nearly every house had but one story, with seven or nine big, gay-looking windows facing the street. A second story was admitted only in the back part of the house, which looked upon a spacious yard, surrounded by numbers of small buildings, used as kitchens, stables, cellars, coach-houses, and as dwellings for the retainers and servants. A wide gate opened upon this yard, and a brass plate on it usually bore the inscription, "House of So-and-So, Lieutenant or Colonel, and Commander," very seldom "Major General" or any similarly elevated rank. But if a more luxurious house, embellished by a gilded iron railing and an iron gate, stood in one of these streets, the brass plate on the gate was sure to bear the name of "Commerce Counsel," or "Honorable Citizen So-and-So."

As a child, Kropotkin's father, the Prince, was the type of the old Russian Boyard. The boy's mother was dead. Kropotkin in his younger days learned to love the serfs, who took care of him. He describes the horrors of serfdom:

> If I were to relate what I heard of in those years it would be a much more gruesome narrative; stories of men and women torn from their families and their villages, and sold, or lost in gambling, or exchanged for a couple of hunting dogs, then transported to some remote part of Russia for the sake of creating a new estate; of children taken from their parents and sold to cruel or dissolute masters; of flogging "in the stables," which occurred every day with unheard-of cruelty; of a girl who found her only salvation in drowning herself; of an old man who had grown gray-haired in his master's service, and at last hanged himself under his master's window, and of revolts of serfs, which were suppressed by Nicholas I.'s Generals by flogging to death each tenth or fifth out of the ranks, and by laying waste the village whose inhabitants, after a military execution, went begging for bread in the neighboring provinces, as if they had been the victims of a conflagration. As to the poverty which I saw during our journeys in certain villages, especially in those which belonged to the imperial family, no words would be adequate to describe the misery to readers who have not seen it.

When the little Prince was present at some Court ceremony at Moscow, the engaging ways of the child so interested the Emperor that he appointed him to be a page. In time Kropotkin entered the military school at St. Petersburg. With the death of Nicholas and the reign of Alexander II. came the first great changes in Russia.

[illegible] Kropotkin describes. In studying the history of those Russian Emperors [illegible] remarks in his remarkable way that all men were born free and equal. The first premise must be granted, but the second, never, for, alas! God in His infinite wisdom does not give to [illegible] the same brains, or the identical [illegible] structure. Then, in studying the [illegible] character of the volume, written [illegible] honestly, it should be borne in mind that [illegible] emanates from a source absolutely alien [illegible] our race and civilization. A Russian, to [illegible] it in a comic way, is not a German, an American, or an Englishman. Racial instincts differ. Such drastic methods as are suggested by Prince Kropotkin might be advantageous in the domain of the Czar and be the cause of ruin in other countries.

Prince Kropotkin is singularly impersonal, and that has its merit, but his ends and aims are as seemingly vague as they are impossible. There are many contradictions. The author of the volume would not kill a fly, and yet he advocates the extermination of those opposed to his theories. As Mr. Courténey expresses it, Tolstoi, the dreamer, believes that, through religion and the teaching of the Gospel the whole world will be saved. He eliminates the question of time. Kropotkin is not afraid of violence. He is "on amicable terms with the extreme section of Nihilism." Contrasting Tolstoi and Kropotkin, the first may believe that by the means of pure literature he will change the status of the world, the latter thinks the betterment of mankind will come about by the study of science. Both these men early in their lives were in revolt with their surroundings. Kropotkin and Tolstoi were of the nobility, and were born when Nicholas of unhappy memory was Emperor. Mr. Brandes, in his preface, writes of Kropotkin:

> He has lived the life of the aristocrat and the worker; he has been one of the Emperor's pages and a poverty-stricken writer; he has lived the life of the student, the officer, the man of science, the explorer of unknown lands, the administrator, and the hunted revolutionist. In exile he has had at times to live upon bread and tea as a Russian peasant; and he has been exposed to espionage and assassination plots like a Russian Emperor.

Mr Savage Landor's Work in Thibet.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

To dispel once for all the impression created by attacks impugning the accuracy of my observations and surveys during my journey in Southwest Thibet in 1897, may I state that Sir Clements Markham, President of the Royal Geographical Society, properly anxious to establish the truth, ordered a new and thorough examination to be made into my geographical work by Mr. John Coles, professional expert of the society. Mr. Coles's report was read to me by Sir Clements Markham, and it is to the effect that my observations for latitude, longitude, and altitude were accurately taken and the plotting work well done, proving, therefore, the attacks of Sir Thomas Holdich and Mr. Douglas Freshfield absolutely unfounded. It was because I knew my work to be accurate that I was so ready to submit all my documents a second time to the society on the assurance given me by Sir Clements Markham that the results of the inquiry would be published in the society's journal. As this result reflects more credit on me than upon my traducers, it is possible that those members of the Council who gave publicity to charges against me may now find it expedient to declare such a report confidential. It would be interesting if the public, and particularly the members of the society, would inquire into the doings of those members of the Council and officials of the Royal Geographical Society, and they may then discover why and wherefore such misleading statements were circulated and their official denial, that has been in the hands of the society for several months, still withheld.

Regarding the last point of the controversy, viz.: "The connection," imagined by my critics, "of the Mansarowar and Rakastal Lakes in Thibet," the Royal Geographical Society has, in a letter from Lieut. Channer, 1st 3d Gourkhas, (who crossed the ridge between the two lakes in 1895,) received further and undeniable evidence substantiating in every detail my assertion "that no visible connection exists between the two lakes."

Having proved my critics to be wrong on every point, I remain, Sir, yours truly,

A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR.

St. Ermin's Hotel, Westminster, London, Dec. 7, 1899.

Mr. Landor, as readers of THE NEW YORK TIMES already know, arrived in this city a week ago under engagement to lecture in many parts of the country.

[illegible] New York Times Saturday Review:

[illegible] correspondent in Arizona, who calls "itself a 'Boston Crowd,'" Tells him a common error of [illegible] confounding "loneliness" with solitude, and when he asserts that "only a lonely man knows the true friendship of books" he is guilty of an Irish bull or something like it. A man who "knows the friendship of books" never is and never was a lonely man, though he may be a solitary man.

As the genial author of "The Art of Living Alone," Mr. A. H. Bradford, says (which par parenthese I highly recommend to your readers as a suggestive little book, though I do not agree with all the author's positions,) "there are no solitudes like those of the city. A man may be more utterly alone in a crowd than on the ocean or in the forest. Loneliness is a matter of spirit rather than of location. He who is adjusted to his environment can hardly be called lonely, although no other human being is near; and he who is not so adjusted may be as solitary on the Strand or on Broadway, as in the heart of Africa." (Page 4.) And again, "He who has made friends of mountain and stars, for whom the trees have voices, is seldom lonely, however much he may be alone." (Page 57.)

Nor is your correspondent any more felicitous in his assertion that "you may gather in city streets the wisdom of humanity, but you must go to the desert to come at the heart of books. Only a lonely man in a lonely land can weigh them at their true value." This sounds well in the reading, but it is utterly untrue. In contradiction I venture the assertion that nowhere in this world are books better appreciated than in the "busy haunts of men" by persons whose tastes and inclinations lead them away from the distractions and the follies of the crowds who find their delights in externals.

I believe, too, your readers would mostly bear me out in the assertion that the faculty of literary appreciation and of all other kinds of effective thought is much more keen in the city than in the country, where, indeed, nature is much more distracting to the concentration of the mind than the noise and bustle of the city.

Your correspondent compares the wisdom of humanity "with the heart of books."

What, I should like to inquire, is "the heart of books" other than the permanent "wisdom of humanity"?

"Let us free our minds from cant," on these and all other subjects, for, as Carlyle observes, "Cant is itself properly a double-distilled lie, the materia prima of the devil, from which all falsehoods, imbecilities, and abominations, body themselves, and from which no true thing can come."

There is a vast amount of humbug "afloat in this world, walking in the darkness, seeking whom it may devour," and this cant about lonelliness merely from lack of human society is the most tedious and offensive. The true place to really enjoy the delights of solitude is in a city, and the least lonely place is the country, that is, for any mortal whose brain is sufficiently capacious to entertain two ideas at the same time.

If I do not pursue this line of thought further it is because (and only because) the editor of THE SATURDAY REVIEW refuses to print any reflections upon the best half of the genus homo. I cannot blame him, though I may think he cultivates too much his inclination for a quiet and peaceful career.

To return to our literary muttons. There are many persons who find it next to impossible to do effective reading in the country.

Perhaps most of my fair friends would confirm this opinion from the result of every succeeding Summer's experience.

They pack their trunks for each annual vacation with the same high resolve that at least this period of rest in the country shall be an exception; that it shall not be wasted this year they will virtuously determine to improve their minds. With Catolike austerity, with stoical virtue, they store in the mysterious recesses of their Saratogas, amid the worldly, yet necessary, suggestions of ruffles, fichus, and chiffons, a goodly and sufficient store of mental pabulum, which shall fill every possible cavity of their cerebrum and cerebellum, and so bring them home in the Fall fit applicants for membership in the most advanced feminine literary organization. They will study Roman history from the pages of the Polish novelist with the unpronounceable name; they will become familiar with the history of America from a comprehensive reading of the "Colonial" novels, (manufactured for just such a demand;) they will do more, they will invade the higher realms of literary activity and fill themselves full of morals and ethics by reading the essays on life and manners contained in "The Young Lady and Gentleman's Home Gazette." Mayhap, more ambitious, still eager for higher flights of "soul culture," they will grapple with the mystical idealism of the Prophetess Eddy.

But, alas! for all these well-intentioned resolves, these inchoate, embryonic feminine giants of intellect return to town in the Fall but little wiser than they left.

The distracting allurements of the country have turned their heads; the seductions of the rocking chair on the piazza and the "afternoon nap" have proved too much.

They are compelled to await the coming of the long Winter nights in town for the leisure to carry into effect those high intellectual purposes which they had nobly resolved to bring to fruition during the Summer's rest.

Thus we see that the city and not the Foreign Daily Papers in New York.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

We hear often of the cosmopolitan character of New York. Perhaps in no way is it more evident than in the number of periodicals printed within its borders in foreign tongues.

Having occasion recently to pass some time in the lower east side of the city, I was struck by the number of alien newspapers for sale in the streets, and it occurred to me to see how many there were. I have succeeded in making a collection of eighteen daily newspapers now being printed in foreign tongues in the Borough of Manhattan, which may or may not be complete, but I think is nearly so.

First, I catalogue six Jewish dailies. I shall not ask you to print their titles in the flaming, sabre-like characters of the Hebrew type, suggestive of the sword of the Lord and of Gideon, but will give their English translations:

The Jewish Herald, Democratic; The Jewish Daily News, independent; Forward, Social Democratic; The People's Gazette, Social Labor; The Evening Paper, Social Labor official organ; The Evening Post, independent.

Next, five German dailies: New Yorker Staats-Zeitung, old and respectable; New Yorker Volks-Zeitung, Socialist; Gross New Yorker Zeitung, Republican; New Yorker Herold, evening paper; Morgen Journal, the German edition of one yellow friend.

Next, three Italian dailies: Il Progreso Italo-Americano, Democratic; L'Araldo Italiano, independent; Bolletino della Sera, independent, evening.

Next one French daily: Courrier des Etats-Unis, old and respectable, price 4 cents, and has no cheaper rival. Frenchmen in New York are either very patriotic or the poorer ones do not read.

Next, two Bohemian dailies: Hlas Lidu, (People's Voice,) Socialist; New Yorkske Listy, (New York Paper,) also Socialist. The acquisition of these took me to the well up-town east side. Dwellers in the aristocratic East Seventy-second Street are probably not aware that if they follow their street to the water front they will come upon a Bohemian settlement, with jaw-cracking signs hung out on every side, and having nothing in common with the rest of New York but the conventional pattern of houses. Still, it is not as foreign looking as the lower east side, whose streets are narrower and more crowded, especially with peddlers hawking the strangest of wares. Anyhow, the fair Bohemienne who sold me the last of these papers need ask no odds of the classic Perdita, nor needs, like her, poetic license to claim an abode close to the sea.

Lastly, one Syrian daily, Kawkab America, (Star of America,) printed in Arabic. "The Only Oriental Daily Independent Journal in America" it styles itself, and I think that is true, probably without the political qualification. The headpiece of this paper is an imposing work of art. The name, in great Arabic flourishes, occupies the centre, above which the Statue of Liberty floods light upon it, while two eagles bearing scrolls fly to the pyramids and the Sphinx and the minarets of a Saracenic village on each side, the scrolls doubtless bearing invitation to come to the land of liberty. Circling around the name is a vast concourse of faithful Mussulmans hailing the Star of America, some mounted on camels, donkeys, and horses. The larger figures in front are well drawn and faithfully portray Arab character.

Like the Bohemians, I had some little trouble to get this, as there are none for sale on the street, and a visit to the Arab quarter in lower Washington Street gave me little aid, as I could not read the signs. However, a friendly apothecary put me in the right path, and the courteous editor, when I found him, took some trouble to ascend to the printing office in the upper story to procure me a copy, for which he chivalrously declined to be paid. May he prosper!

One thing may be noted in this collection—the soundness of our alien population for Socialistic papers. It is a lesson to commend to the statesman.

The Two Philip Hales.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In the notice of my exhibition at Messrs. Durand-Ruel's, which you were good enough to put in your columns, you speak of me as the "Musical Critic." I ought to say that I have never written musical criticism, and that I fear you confuse me with Mr. Philip Hale, the musical critic of The Boston Journal. I should be sorry to seem to covet any laurels he may have won in that position. I shall be greatly obliged if you will rectify this error, (very natural on account of the similarity of names,) and I beg you to believe me, yours very truly,

Death of the Old Year—1899.

Last night the wan old year,
Baffled, scarred, and troubled sore,
Weighed down with burdens, big with fear,
Stumbled, and fell to rise no more.

Time, veil his errors, magnify the good,
Judge not by what he did, but what he would,
Wind, breathe a solemn requiem of sighs
Over the vanquished where he lies.

Through the brain of the dying king,
Memory, untethered, flashes grim fantasies.

"The king is dead! Long live the king!"
Clangs out the bells' triumphant ring.
O, joy bells, hush!—the pain it gives—
The year is dead, but memory lives.

NORUMBEGA.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In your SATURDAY REVIEW of Oct. 14th is an extract from John Fiske's "Dutch and Quaker Colonies of America," in which he discusses at length the origin of the word Norumbega, and quoted a number of sources which are supposed to throw light upon this subject as well as upon the question, Where was Norumbega? Permit me to add a few words concerning these disputed points, which I believe deserve the fullest attention of your readers.

I have in my possession a Bible printed in German at Basel, Switzerland, in 1665, with a map of the world, evidently the copy of a Spanish map of an earlier date, which was enlarged by some cartographer, and enriched with German, French, and English names of places, &c., and a short text in Latin.

On this map the word Norumbega appears on the west coast of the Bay of Fundy, running north and south, and under the bay appear the words B. de Norembegue. The south banks of the St. Lawrence are called Nova Francia, and the north banks Nova Britannia. The introductory and explanatory text in German, which covers nearly the entire back, furnishes an interesting illustration of the wild speculations in which scientists of those days indulged and reads as follows:

There is only a narrow sea between Asia and America which is called the Straits of Annam, and through which the descendants of Magog can conveniently march into America. It is also likely that the inhabitants of the northwest of America descend from Gomer, for here lies the land which the Spaniards call Norumbega, which is the Spanish word for Norway. Still further to the northwest lies Estotiland, which sounds like a German word, and the people who in our days have visited these regions describe the inhabitants' way of living, their manners and mode of dressing as coinciding closely with the customs prevailing in Lapland, in Finland, and in Norway. Intercourse between those countries and Greenland was very common in olden times, but it has ceased entirely.

It would result from these words that the name of Norumbega did not apply to a small section of the North American continent, but to the entire then known territory north of the Spanish possessions, and this assumption gains color by the assertion of Matthew Merian, Frankfort, 1710, that the Spanish fort of St. Helen's on the Atlantic Coast of Florida was standing on the southern end of "the Land Norumbega."

On the Atlantic Coast we find B. du petit capitaine, (presumably Frenchman's Bay near Bar Harbor;) B. Guentebeguin, (perhaps Penobscot Bay;) Croaton, Wocohon, Charlefort, (in Florida, built in 1651;) B. St. Helen's, in latitude 32, and below it a mythical island called Guatrio. Other islands given are: One without a name, east of Newfoundland, the northern point of which is called Cape Raza Fagunda; I. Sable, Barbuda, in latitude 38 east of Cape Henry; S. Cruz and S. Brandon, east of I. Sable; S. Anna, latitude 35 east of Barbuda; Septcitez, in latitude 27 and about 500 miles east of Cuba.

The entire coast from the lines of Northern Massachusetts to the Delaware Capes is omitted, and the words Virgi and Apala appear just below the southern boundaries of Maine. In consulting the Latin "Introduction into General Geography," by Philip Cluver, Amsterdam, 1729, I find the word Norumbega to stretch from what is now the centre of the State of Ohio to the head of the Bay of Fundy, and the reference to Nova Fransia to read as follows:

Pars tamen ejus quae ad mare accedit, Norumbega ab urbe cognomine dicta coelo potitur salubri soloque foecundo, Norumbegâ urbe et fluvium qui Rio Grande vulgo dicitur, sita est.—Loca a Gallis ibi observata sunt: Porto del refugio, Porto reale Paradiso, Flora, Angolema, verum com Hispani alia et Galli alia hisce locis indiderint nomina magna reperitur in tabulis geographicis discrepantia. Caeterum Norumbegam dictum putant quasi Norwegiam, seu coloniam a Norwegia eo deductam.

The forgoing words seem to confirm the assumption that Norumbega was the name of the entire continent, and leave hardly any doubt that the French (Galli) claimed not only Canada, but also the entire territory south as their own, but their possessions formed only a part of Norumbega, and not vice versa.

They must have settled on the North River and in Providence Bay (Angolema and Porto del refugio) in the sixteenth century. The supposition that the Rio Grande is idential with the Hudson, and that the urbs is the forerunner of New Amsterdam does not appear to be far fetched in view of the fact that there is no other large river north of the Hudson, and that both river and city are given as situated in New France.

I have not been able to discover who gave the Spanish names to Providence Bay and others, and it is left to the historians of our day to ascertain the names of those intrepid explorers who first placed their foot upon the banks of the Hudson.

Characters in Scott.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In reply to the course of reading laid out in Walter Scott's romances for a young girl, I think the novels selected are his finest works, and in their order of perusal show careful thought and discrimination. For an older mind perhaps "Rob Roy" might be more fascinating than "Quentin Durward," but from a moral standpoint it would not be so intellectual.

Rob Roy MacGregor is a strong, fearless character, bold, audacious, and wild. It was said that Scott, when he wanted a claymore, dirk, and pistols; it shall never be said that a foeman saw Rob Roy MacGregor defenseless and unarmed." While Quentin is a different man, certainly charming, valiant, and heroic. In an art gallery I once saw a beautiful painting of Quentin Durward, clad in black velvet, wearing the white cross, rescuing Isabella de Croye from ruffians in the little cobblestone street, making a strange picture and illustrating his idea of true chivalry.

All of Scott's characters are not only valuable for the wonderful historical interest attached to them, but in nearly all his books admiration for virtue against guilt is delightfully and forcibly shown. Some of his people of fancy which might appeal to most any one are, among others, Jonathan Oldbuck in "The Antiquary," a quaint, good-tempered old bachelor, with plenty of common sense and humor, which make him interesting, and along with him place Robert Paterson, or "Old Mortality," because of his numerous visits to the churchyards and his occupation of retouching the tombstones—two queer old fellows, both attractive in their peculiar ways. Ivanhoe is remarkable for self-denial; Rebecca's adoration for him, even when hopeless, shows two lives, one noble and good, the other unrestrained, passionate, and scheming. Jeanie Dean, in "Heart of Midlothian," is an unusual woman of real devotion. The Bride of Lammermoor is tragic and pathetic, her love for Lord Ruthverford, marriage to David Dunbar of Baldoon, and Janet, in her madness, are weird in their intensity. In "Kenilworth" Queen Elizabeth, in all her glory, appears on the scene; the picture of the procession to the castle exceeds any fairy tale ever written; it's a charming description not easily forgotten. Amy Robsart, too, has her part in the story, sad, not majestic like a Queen, but the heroine nevertheless.

Then we have Guy Mannering, brave fellow, and Meg Merrilies, a true witch, a type of old Bohemia. These are a few of Scott's lovely creatures of fancy, many taken from real life, woven into entertaining romances, completing powerful novels, seldom read or understood by younger people, but enjoyed more and more as you read and appreciate their exquisite language and literary value. His analysis of life, clear conception of character, strong distinction between right and wrong, place Sir Walter Scott foremost as a novelist of historical romance. His character sketches in themselves would interest the average reader more than the story, perhaps, for, like the works of many of our greatest authors, a cultivated taste can only understand its hidden beauty.

Nooks and Corners of Old New York.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

"Old" New York is full of "nooks and corners" to-day that are of interest to the antiquarian and to the local historian.

Few of America's cities are so rich in graves of illustrious and distinguished men, and much could yet be written appealing to the lovers of its past history.

Several works are in existence that have gathered within their covers records of this past of the great city. Aside from Mrs. Martha J. Lamb's history, Valentine's historical monograph, Dr. Francis's scholarly "Old New York," &c., perhaps the most important of all, certainly the one presenting the richest mine, is the work of David Thomas Valentine, i. e., the "Manuals of the Corporation of New York City." Aside from these volumes, we have "Haswell's Reminiscences," "Felix Oldboy's Tour," Thomas F. De Voe's "History of the New York Markets," and now quite recently Hemstreet's "Nooks and Corners." Certain statements, however, in this latter work need some qualifications, I think. On Page 148 it is recorded that at Tripler Hall Miss Adelina Patti first appeared, on Sept. 22, 1852. This statement is all right, but it must be borne in mind that Jenny Lind sang there the first night this hall was opened, Wednesday, Sept. 11, 1850. It was built especially for the "Swedish Nightingale," but, it not being completed in time, her first concerts were given at Castle Garden. Again, the statement regarding the church edifice on Eighth Street, opposite Lafayette Place, (now a German theatre,) is misleading. It was not built for Dr. Schroeder, who was one of the ministers of Trinity Parish and esteemed a great orator, but was practically the same building occupied by Dr. Macaulay's congregation (Presbyterian) that had stood on Murray Street, between Church Street and College Place, (now West Broadway,) north side. It was taken down stone by stone and put up on Eighth Street and occupied by the Presbyterians some time. When Dr. Schroeder resigned from Trinity Parish his admirers rented or nominally purchased this building, and it was known as the Church of the Crucifixion. For some reasons, probably pecuniary ones, this congregation was not successful in establishing a parish, and the church was given up. My impression is that the property at one time came into the possession of A. T. Stewart. Again, on Page 97, in reference to Brougham's Lyceum, when this passed into the hands of the elder Wallack, it was never called Wallack's Lyceum, but was always known as "Wallack's Theatre." If I am informed rightly. The reference to John Jacob Astor alludes to his residing on "Lafayette Place." His own house was never on that street, so far as I can learn. Mr. Hemstreet, if my informant is correct, on the south corner of Broadway and Barclay Street [illegible] Garden." The doorplate, I am told, simply bore the inscription, "Mr. Astor." The office of the Astor family was around the corner, on Prince Street, a one-story brick building about twenty-five feet wide. Here it was that Fitz-Greene Halleck for many years performed his clerical duties.

In speaking of the murder of Mary Cecilia Rogers, (the pretty cigar girl,) whose home was on Nassau Street, it is stated that "Anderson's tobacco store, where she was employed, was in the St. Nicholas Hotel." This is clearly an error. This hotel was not built for some years after the murder, and "Anderson's tobacco store" was on Broadway, near to where the New York Hospital then stood. It may be noted that Poe's tale of "Marie Roget" is founded on this Rogers murder.

While on the whole Mr. Hemstreet's book is a desirable addition to our literature of "Old New York," yet it is rather too sketchy and has a little of the character of a guide-book. It lacks the distinctly literary flavor of Dr. John Flavel Mines's most excellent work, as well as the interesting details of Mr. Haswell's volume.

WILLIAM HYATT FARRINGTON.

New York, Dec. 18, 1899.

Kipling and Newman.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

There is not a more thankless task than the attempt to prove that some gem of poetry or prose is, after all, nothing more than a clever plagiarism. That task shall never be mine. I am quite in accord with the philosophic view of Lowell:

Though old the thought and oft expressed,

It is always profitable, however, to study what the Germans call the "sources" of an author or of a poem or idea that promises to be immortal. Many efforts have been made recently to convict Rudyard Kipling of having stolen some of the best lines in his "Recessional," but I think that all these attempts have failed. They have not established any theft of ideas, nor have they even shown the probable "sources" of this exquisite hymn of national humility in a time of much vainglory.

The true source of Kipling's "Recessional" may be found, I think, in the short poem by Cardinal John Henry Newman called "England," which I give below. Any one who will carefully compare these two poems, similar in verse structure, in theme, in matter, in phrase, and in spirit, must inevitably come, I think, to two conclusions: one, that Newman's poem suggested—consciously or sub-consciously—Kipling's "Recessional," and the other, that Kipling's poem is infinitely superior to Newman's. The palm is certainly borne off by the younger and more virile singer. But it should also be remembered that this suggestion of Newman dims to that extent the glory of the "Recessional." To be absolutely great, it should not remind us of any similar poem, save by way of contrast, as "Adonais" and "In Memoriam" remind us of "Lycidas," though each has its own splendid originality. Emerson truly says that "he is great who is what he is from nature and who never reminds us of others."

Some of Kipling's phrases have the same ring as Newman's. Compare, for instance,

If drunk with sight of power, we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe,

But should vain tongues the Bride of Heaven defy.

The Cardinal makes England place her trust "in crafty fort" and "rock renowned, earned upon hostile ground," while Kipling puts it "in reeking tube and iron shard." But the main point of similarity is in the spirit that informs both poems. This is exactly identical, and their very flesh and blood are the same; only each poet has thrown over the form his own garment of words—Newman clothing his in sackcloth, Kipling investing his in royal purple. Newman's poem follows:

ENGLAND.

Type of the West, and glorying in the name
More than in Faith's pure fame!
O trust not pretty fort nor rock renown'd
Earn'd upon hostile ground;
Wielding Trade's masterkeys, at thy proud will
To lock or ope its waters, England! trust not still!

Trade, thine own power! Since haughty

E. P. ROE.

His Sister's Reminiscences of This Popular Author.*

That the "Reminiscences of the Life of E. P. Roe," by his sister, Mary A. Roe, which has just appeared, will appeal to a wide audience, isevidenced by the great popularity of his books, some of which are said to have gone into twenty or more editions, the total number of copies sold in America aggregating more than a million. His books have also been published in England and her colonies—an authorised edition from advance sheets being arranged for in almost every case, while most of the stories have also been translated into French and German.

Many to whom Mr. Roe's work in literature may not specially appeal will be interested in reading this biography of a strong, earnest, hard-working man, who put so much of himself into all his undertakings—who first as Army Chaplain, then as minister of a small country parish, which through his untiring efforts he was able after a nine years' pastorate to leave in a most prosperous condition; then as the writer of books—all intended to convey a strong ethical lesson, and which, from their very lack of a certain purely literary charm may have appealed all the more strongly to the large audience he wished to and certainly succeeded in reaching. Mr. Roe's success in raising small fruits and the clear practical advice his books on that subject offer have no doubt made them very valuable both to the small growers and to the amateur who only wishes to supply his own needs.

Born in a roomy, old-fashioned country house, Mr. Roe and the sister who writes these reminiscences—the youngest two of a family of six—passed a very happy childhood, the book containing pretty stories of their early days, both children showing that intense love for the country and its pleasures which always distinguished Mr. Roe's books. The latter's school and college days were very happy ones, his graduation from Williams being followed by a course of study at a theological seminary, interrupted in 1862 by his becoming Chaplain of the famous Harris Light Cavalry, under the command of Kilpatrick, who became later Brigadier and Major General—all the evidence to be gathered from the story of Mr. Roe's life goes to prove that in these army days he was to an unusual extent the right man in the right place—as, for instance, The New York Tribune correspondent wrote from the field:

> Chaplain Roe of the Second New York (Harris Light) Cavalry is a man whose praises are in the mouth of every one for timely and efficient services. He is always with the regiment, and his whole time is devoted to the temporal and spiritual welfare of the men. He is their friend, adviser and counselor, and commands the respect of all who know him—something that cannot be said of every Chaplain in the army.

While with this regiment, Mr. Roe also acted as weekly correspondent for The New York Evangelist, many of the letters then written being given in the book, which will be found of much interest. In November, 1863, Mr. Roe received a month's leave of absence, during which time he was married to Miss Anna Sands of New York, Mrs. Roe remaining with her own family when her husband returned to his duties.

In March, 1864, Mr. Roe having been made Chaplain of the Hampton (Va.) Hospital, his wife joined him and was able to be of much assistance. Miss Roe thinks "a tribute is due the brave young wife who, leaving a home of luxury, accepted without a word of regret the privations of hospital life, and was untiring in her devotion to the sick and wounded."

In July, 1864, Mr. Roe made an appeal to the readers of The Evangelist for money to carry out a scheme of his own devising. The General United States Hospital at Hampton, Va., was then very large, averaging from 2,500 to 3,000 patients, while preparations were going on for receiving still larger numbers—it being the largest permanent hospital in the neighborhood of the front. Those who were strong enough to bear the journey were gradually sent North.

> Our wards being mainly filled with what are termed "the worst cases"—men with whom the struggle for life will be long and doubtful. * * * How shall they spend these long, hot, weary days? Give them cheerful, entertaining, and instructive books and the question is about solved. Who can calculate the value of a brave, cheerful book? It stimulates and strengthens the mind, which reacts upon the weakened body, and the man is at once made stronger, wiser, and better. * * * I find that sick soldiers are like good people North; they do not like religious reading all the time.

The result of this appeal was very satisfactory to Mr. Roe, some 3,000 well-selected volumes being addressed to the hospital library, which after the war were deposited in Fort Monroe, where Mr. Roe saw them years afterward, still in constant use, and in good preservation. Many of the hospital stories are very interesting, but space will not allow further extracts.

Soon after the close of the war Mr. Roe accepted a call to a little church at Highland Falls, near West Point, where nine happy, busy years were passed. The end of this period found his congregation—in the beginning a "mere handful"—the owners of a fine new stone church and a comfortable parsonage, which had cost $30,000, a great part of which had been raised through Mr. Roe's own efforts. His health being impaired by overwork, physicians advised him to give up either writing or preaching, so he reluctantly decided to resign his pastorate, feeling he could do more real good through his books:

> I know my books are read by thousands; my voice reached at most but a few hundred. * * * My object in writing, as in preaching, is to do good, and the question is, which can I do best? I think with the pen, and I shall go on writing, no matter what the critics say.

Miss Roe tells us of a "bundle of letters her brother showed her, saying: 'These are mostly from young men, not one of whom I know, who have written to me of the benefit received from my books.' He then read to me some of those touching letters of confession and thanks for his inspiring help to a better life."

The view from the piazza at Roelands, Mr. Roe's place at Cornwall, is exceedingly beautiful, commanding a fine view of the river and mountains. Here Mr. Roe was very fond of entertaining his friends, and here each year, about the middle of June, when his roses and strawberries were at their height, he used to entertain the Philolethean Club, which consisted of New York clergymen, including Dr. Howard Crosby, Dr. Lyman Abbott, and others equally well-known, and in recent years the members of the Authors Club, to both of which he himself belonged. On June 16, 1888, the members of the latter club were invited to Roelands, passing there a most delightful day; the Philolethean Club paying its eighteenth annual and last visit in the same month. On the 19th of July, in that year, Mr. Roe complained of not feeling very well, but passed the day about as usual. In the evening he was in his library reading aloud to his daughter and a friend, when he was suddenly taken with a sharp pain about the heart, dying in less than an hour. "At the age of fifty, in the full vigor of manhood, his earthly career came to an end."

Mr. Roe personally seems to have had hosts of friends, as the following extract from a letter from Julian Hawthorne best shows:

> He was so good a man that no one can take his place with those who knew him. It is the simple truth that he cared for his friends more than for himself; that his greatest happiness was to see others happy; that he would have more rejoiced in the literary fame of one of his friends than in any such fame of his own winning. All his leisure was spent in making plans for the pleasure and profit of other people; * * * so many generous, sweet, noble deeds of his strong in my memory—deeds done so unobtrusively, delicately and heartily, that I feel the uselessness of trying to express his value. * * * He was at once manly and childlike; manly in honor, truth and tenderness; childlike in simplicity—that suspects no guile and practices none. He had in him that rare quality of loving sympathy that prompted sinners to bring their confessions to him, and ask help and counsel of him—which he gave, and human love into the bargain.

And again we find the following: "His kindly disposition and charm of conversation and manner, his wide charity, made him an always welcome companion."

On Decoration Day, 1894, the people of Cornwall dedicated a memorial park—Roe Park—a wild spot in the rear of his old home, a bronze tablet to Mr. Roe's memory being placed on one of the huge boulders on which he and his friends had so often rested after one of their long walks. The following extract is from Lyman Abbott's memorial address, given on that day:

> Roe's novels have been universally read because they have uniformly ministered to the higher life of the readers. * * * No man, woman or child ever read through one of Mr. Roe's books and arose without being bettered by the reading—without having a clearer faith, a brighter hope, and a deeper and richer love for his fellow man. * * * He saw the grandeur that there is in life. He felt the heart that beats in a woman's bosom, and the heart that beats in a soldier's breast. He felt it because his own heart had known the purity of womanhood and the courage of manhood. He portrayed something of that purity, something of that courage, something of that divine manhood, because he possessed the qualities that made him a hero on the battlefield, and so made him a preacher of heroism in human life.

So whatever the opinion we may personally have of the literary value of Mr. Roe's work—of its ethical importance there can hardly be a doubt. This story of his life-work will surely prove an "inspiration to the higher, nobler, and diviner life which he—preacher, writer, soldier, pastor, and citizen—has left in human life."

Aralow for Avalon.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Constant readers and inquiring friends may be mystified by the whichness of the what of "Aralow," as cited in a communication to THE SATURDAY REVIEW from me last week. If so, be it known that this is not some province or some personage of Nephelococcygia, but an airy nothing born of my ambiguous penmanship and the compositor's fearful guess. I meant to write it Avalon. Mea culpa!

Stevenson's Christmas Sermon.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Thank you for the transcription of R. L. Stevenson's Christmas sermon. One cannot read it too often at any season.

I don't think the Christmas spirit is decaying; but people get tired out trying to spread it over too large an area. A practical solution reached by myself and friends some years ago was: At Christmas give only to relatives, household dependents, and the poor. All other friends remember on their birthdays. This involves a little personal attention and thought, but surely is not less acceptable for that. And when thoroughly understood and adopted by one's friends it is also a great relief to them.

LONDON FULL OF BASELESS RUMORS

No Truth in the Report that Lord Salisbury Is to Retire.

THE DELAGOA BAY QUESTION

Difficulties of Transport Will Increase in South Africa.

Buller Getting Ready for Another Attack on the Boers—Improbability of European Interference in South Africa—Indian Congress.

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—We close the year in dogged mood, strong still in hope, but braced to meet further disappointments.

The holiday with which this week commenced gave a truce to political speculations, and brought a lull over the violent sensationalism of the less reputable portion of our press. But since we got back to work we have been treated to more than one pretty sensation. Having no battles to describe, something has to be done to keep public curiosity alive and the sales of the evening rags in full swing.

To this necessity we owe the rumor that Lord Salisbury is about to retire. I can find no shadow of foundation for this statement beyond the fact that his lordship has been much depressed over the loss of his wife and from the results of repeated attacks of influenza. It is just possible that in a moment of gloom he may have talked of laying down his burden, but that he has any serious intention of doing so is untrue, and in official circles nothing is known of even a casual expression on his part to this effect. We may put the story aside as a pure invention.

Another sensation that has been worked for what it is worth has been manufactured in Germany, whence came a circumstantial account of a treaty between ourselves and the Kaiser over the disposal of the colonial possessions of Portugal. I have no doubt the whole story is already familiar to your readers, and I will only point out one statement that was by itself sufficient to stamp the entire tale as a fabrication. Germany was to have Goa and Macao, the romancer announced. As if we should be willing to allow that powerful empire to take possession of a corner of the Indian Peninsula that in its hands could become a dangerous centre around which disaffection might gather to our injury, or give the same Power an opportunity to block our way in Southern China and make our position at Hong Kong and the mainland perhaps some day untenable.

False as is this tale of the purchase of Portugal's African possessions by Great Britain and a general partition of her colonies between us and Germany, there is something brewing in regard to the East African port, but what I cannot tell you.

EVEN LETTERS ARE CENSORED.

We know nothing here, even about the seizure of cargoes from the United States, except what comes to us via New York. There never was in our history a war during which the press censorship has been carried out with the rigor now shown. No news of any value comes through us. Even accounts of the Colenso fight are still confused and imperfect, so that we cannot understand why Gen. Sir Redvers Buller lost so many men, or how the various baffled attacks were delivered.

Letters, even, are no longer sacred, and some of our most rabid jingo prints are beginning to complain that their correspondents are not allowed to send by post what they have written. Letters do arrive, but they have first been opened under martial law, and mutilated to suit the taste or whim of the censor. Were we not just a little bit crazy there would be a tremendous hubbub over this repression of everything disagreeable, and by and by clamor is certain to arise.

Meanwhile the Delagoa Bay question seems likely to become acute and troublesome. Our hands are much tied in regard to searching ships under neutral flags, because we signed the declaration of Paris in 1856, and it is even doubtful whether we can, under the terms of that declaration, prevent imports of arms and ammunition by the South African Republics via Lorenzo Marques.

PORTUGAL AND DELAGOA BAY.

Nor are we able to coerce Portugal. That little country is fully as sensitive about its colonies as Spain was, and any open attempt on our part to treat Delagoa Bay as temporarily a British port might create deadly mischief sufficient to overturn the Portuguese throne.

Something, however, will have to be done unless a swift victory removes our fears. Some among us have already rushed from one extreme to the other, and live in a sort of terror of further British reverses. Hence the cry for extreme measures in regard to Delagoa Bay, in order to strike at the Boers' source of supplies and starve them. Nothing delights this class of men more than the stories, fabricated for the most part to please the military censors, about Boer exhaustion, discontent, and shortness of ammunition. Regarding all such things we are just as ignorant as if nothing whatever had been printed.

Something of the same temper is behind the outcry for more, still more troops. The escaped Winston Churchill has intensified the eager desire to hurry more men out to South Africa. "We want 250,000 men there," he cries: He is a bright young man, and grandson of a Duke, therefore, although not wise beyond his fellow countrymen nor a great military authority, he is much listened to, and in its present state of unhappy funk the War Office is only too ready to cover its deficiencies by excessive zeal in mustering soldiers and packing them off to the seat of war.

QUESTION OF LAND TRANSPORT.

But in all this bustle and screaming patriotism the great question of land transport appears to continue to be nearly left out of sight. That has been, and in an increasing degree will be, our great difficulty in South Africa. The distances to be traversed, the liability of cavalry and baggage animals to disease, and the scarcity of native food supplies all combine to render the movement of large forces to the interior, where our enemies are, a task of almost insuperable difficulty.

An eminent authority on Indian frontier warfare, Col. Hanna, has pertinently observed that the conditions of campaigning in South Africa are much similar to those encountered by us in Afghanistan, only in an aggravated degree, and in the Afghan war the waste of transport animals was so great that had the last campaign there continued a few months longer, our army would probably have had to rush helter-skelter back within our frontier, or perish from starvation.

Are we going to increase our forces in South Africa to an extent that will render their advance impossible by reason of their numbers? For an army of 50,000 men to be provisioned, with its fighting and baggage animals, is a task of enormous difficulty the moment the railway line is left behind. Already the world is being scoured for mules, and in South Africa itself draught bullocks have been laid hold of to an extent that has already almost exhausted this source of supply. On a march no part of a military force suffers so much as the animals conveying the guns, ammunition, and provender, and without which movement is impossible. We have now come to the season when horse sickness prevails throughout the veldt; how, then, can we expect to render forces of 30,000 or 40,000 men mobile far inland in the devastated enemy's country?

Considerations of this kind do not appear to have entered into the calculations of the War Office authorities at all, and unless victory comes in the next few months, there is going to be a terrible time, not only in South Africa, but here.

Victory, however, is again eagerly expected. It is understood that Sir Redvers Buller is rapidly getting ready to make one more spring at the throats of Joubert and his dogged burghers; therefore it is quite on the cards that before I write again another bloody conflict will have taken place on the banks of the Tugela River. For the sake of speedy peace, one hopes it may be a successful battle, because it is possible that both sides might then be willing to come to terms. Obviously, the more Great Britain is defeated, the more determined she will be to go on to the bitter end.

THE POWERS LESS HOSTILE.

On the Continent, the feeling toward this country has not appreciably altered, but I think it is becoming apparent to statesmen there that the ultimate defeat of Britain might be productive of consequences to the whole of Europe not at all relished.

It is beginning to be seen that Great Britain has been the great dominating force on the side of peace. Thanks to her attitude, the Eastern question has slumbered, and Germany has been kept from adopting a policy of aggression toward her neighbors, especially toward Austria, whose German provinces she looks forward to absorbing within the Fatherland. Noting these facts, I think the disposition of political leaders abroad is at least becoming less hostile toward us, and, although the feeling against our South African policy is unquestionably as hot and bitter as ever throughout Europe, it becomes increasingly improbable that any State will attempt to interfere with us.

Among the other rumors of the week has been a revival of one about Russia's advance upon Afghanistan, but that also is highly improbable. Russia has no interest in stirring up trouble for us on our Northern India frontier at present, because her hands are full in the further East.

Nor is anything going to happen at Constantinople, as far as one can judge. There may be disturbances coming in the Spring in Macedonia, for these are always probable enough, but Russia is not going to stir up rebellion there, and the only probable move on her part is an advance along the southern borders of the Black Sea, with a view to counteracting German influence in Asia Minor.

THE INDIAN FAMINE.

We shall be allowed to fight out our quarrel with the burgher farmers unmolested, for all that is now visible to the contrary. It is just as well, for in no respect is our Indian empire at present in a position to endure the least strain of excitement or warlike expenditure. The number of miserable human beings on famine relief has now risen to 3,000,000, and the population directly affected by the scarcity exceeds 50,000,000. It is the most stupendous calamity of the kind that the peninsula has suffered from since 1877. The famine of two years ago was a sore one, but this is greater, and so far, as I have often told, it has excited no general interest here. Our thoughts are elsewhere.

Happily the Indian bureaucrat is doing his duty, as he can always be trusted to do when emergency arises, and the Government is spending money freely to keep the people alive. The worst of it is that the after effects of famines are becoming more and more terrible, because no time is given to the impoverished peasants to recover from their losses before the taxpayer comes around for arrears of rent.

HINDUS LIKE BRITISH RULE.

What India wants is a long spell of peace, a reduced military establishment, and lighter taxation. Native statesmen and politicians therefore note with delight the ease with which Great Britain has been able to draw upon the British garrison in order to increase her armies in South Africa. This proves, they say, that too many British troops are habitually quartered on the Indian people. It is all a mistake, they assert; the population of India never mutinied, but only the native army, and in countless instances, while the war to subdue the rebel army was in progress the natives showed their sympathy with and loyalty to their alien rulers.

That is the note one hears privately, and it is echoed in the present gathering of the Indian National Congress, a body, one might call it, of amateur players at lawmaking and politics, which gathers every year, and does, I am bound to say, no small good, in spite of the cold shoulder turned to it by officialdom. About a thousand delegates have assembled this week, 400 of them being Mohammedans, to ventilate their ideas on Indian government, their demands for reforms, their suggestions as to the judicature and currency, and so on. The President is a well-known Hindu, occupying a professorial chair at King's College, London, and it is safe to say that from the beginning of this gathering to the end no single word of disloyalty to British supremacy will be uttered.

As Indians have often said to me, British rule is not perfect by any means, but it is very much better than any rule India had before, or than any rival of Great Britain would be likely to give now. I gladly bear this testimony, because it is my misfortune to be continually differing with the British authorities in India on matters of detail.

ESTATES OF MILLIONAIRES.

By a curious coincidence, the engine that drew the train by which the late Duke of Westminster's body was conveyed to Woking for cremation was named the Flying Fox, the same name as that of the Duke's horse which won the last Derby. His estate, by the way, is estimated to amount to £12,000,000, the greatest ever submitted to probate in this country.

During the year now closing seven other millionaires have passed away, with estates exceeding £10,025,000 in aggregate value. The largest of these estates was that of John Gretton, the brewer, who left nearly £3,000,000, and, as the wicked world said, "not a penny of it to charities." Baron Ferdinand Rothschild left only £1,500,000 in this country, but his aggregate wealth was perhaps five times that amount.

PAINTED A BOY YELLOW.

Washington Youths "Initiated" Him into "the Gang."

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—A novel assault case came up in the Washington Police Court to-day. The small boys who live near Eleventh and L Streets are in the habit of "initiating" all new boys in the neighborhood, in order to make them members of the crowd in good and regular standing. Recently a shy boy, named Edward McFarland, moved into 1,240 Eleventh Street with his parents. The boys looked him over and decided that he was eligible for admission into their circle after being initiated, or "cobbed," as they call it.

They asked Edward if he wanted to join "the gang," and when he said he did they took him into a shed and initiated him. They took off his clothes and painted him yellow, and then turned him loose on the street. This was on Christmas Day, and Edward was a fearsome spectacle as he fled madly up the street in his yellow garb, frightening many a holiday convivialist into taking the pledge.

Mrs. McFarland rescued the boy and returned him to his normal color with some difficulty, yellow paint being hard to remove from the person when it has been dried in by a high wind. She disapproved of the initiation, and to-day Fred Spicer, Buck Purcell, John Gray, and William Purcell were arraigned for assault and remanded for a hearing next week.

Position on Naval Affairs Committee Will Be Reserved.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, of which Mr. Boutelle of Maine is Chairman, will begin work early in January on the Naval Appropriation bill. It is not expected that there will be any change in the Chairmanship on account of Mr. Boutelle's serious illness.

The work will be divided among sub-committees. When it comes before the House either Mr. Foss of Illinois or Mr. Dayton of West Virginia will have charge of it, The former is the ranking member of the committee, but Mr. Dayton has always been active in the handling of appropriation bills. By this arrangement Mr. Boutelle will be able to resume his Chairmanship if he recovers.

Congressman Boutelle Resting Easily.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—Congressman Boutelle's condition was reported as unchanged at the McLean Hospital to-night. He was resting very comfortably.

LOCOMOTIVE TRAPS A PIGEON.

Special to The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Dec. 30.—When Engine No. 90, pulling Lake Shore Train No. 32, pulled in to-day it was noticed that the glass of the headlight was broken. Inside was found a carrier pigeon wearing a band inscribed, "4 J. P. B. 98."

It is thought that when the bird was in flight the headlight struck it, the glass breaking. Strangely enough, the pigeon was unhurt.

ARMOUR'S NEW FELT FACTORY.

Alfred Dolge Will Manage the Plant at Newburg.

Special to The New York Times.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Dec. 30.—Philip D. Armour of Chicago is constructing one of the largest felt manufactories in the world in Newburg. The manager will be Alfred Dolge, who last year was forced to make an assignment on account of hard times. At the time of his financial collapse he was employing 1,000 workmen, who composed the village of Dolgeville.

Mr. Dolge immediately after his failure prepared to begin life over again, and his old friend Armour proposed that he accept the management of a new felt factory he had in contemplation.

The machinery, which was sent from Mr. Armour's plant at Chicago, is being placed in position, and the industry will soon be in running order.

SENATOR VEST HOPES TO RETIRE.

Announces that He Will Not Stand for Re-election.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—"My present term will end my career," said Senator Vest of Missouri to-day. "I have written a letter to a friend of mine, an editor in Clay County, in which I have said that this term will bring my public life to a close. In saying this, however, I am simply repeating the statement made to the Missouri Legislature which last elected me, that I would not be a candidate for re-election."

Senator Vest's letter was brought out by a request for his views on the best method of electing Senators, whether by convention or through primaries. In declaring in favor of the convention system on the ground that primaries had resulted in party friction, Senator Vest took occasion to refer to his own lack of personal concern in the matter by announcing that he would not be a candidate again. His term does not expire until 1903, so that he has three years yet to serve.

At the expiration of that time he will have been in the Senate four terms, a total of twenty-four years. He took his seat on the 18th of March, 1879, having been elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Bogy.

WINE GROWING IN FRANCE.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—John C. Covert, United States Consul at Lyons, in a report on the wine interests of France, says in part:

"The reports thus far received from the wine-producing districts of France, Algeria, and Tunis promise a yield of about 1,268,016,000 gallons in 1899. One of the newspaper organs of the wine interests estimates that the surplus production will be absorbed by home consumption, which is shown to be steadily increasing, and by increased distillation for brandy.

"While the production and the consumption of wine in France are steadily increasing, the exportation is diminishing. The quantity exported in 1887 was 65,566,000 gallons. In 1897, ten years later, it had fallen to 46,890,000 gallons. Wine growers were compensated for this shortage by an increase in prices, the money value of the exports of 1887 being $45,109,311 and for 1897 $46,032,060. These figures come from the customs officials, who, during the later years of the decade, placed a higher valuation upon the sparkling wines, which represented three-quarters of the total exports.

"At a meeting of the National Agricultural Society, reported in the Journal Officiel of Sept. 20, 1899, it was set forth as a fundamental principle, never to be lost sight of by French wine growers, that their success must in the future depend entirely upon grafting. This principle is also applicable to the wine growers of Spain, Italy, and perhaps some other countries.

"As nearly as I can learn, it was about 1870 when a Bordeaux wine grower planted in his high-grade vineyard a number of California vines. They took readily to the French soil, sending forth tall and stout branches, rich in fruitage. But in proportion as they advanced, his own vines, which had produced a very choice brand of wine, began to wither and die. An examination demonstrated that they were attacked and destroyed by an infinitesimal insect that multiplied with astonishing rapidity. From year to year it spread, until but few vineyards in France were free from its ravages. It cost France more money than the Franco-Prussian war. Its devastation continues. In the meantime, the American vines flourish and produce in abundance where the others die. Upon examination, it was found that the same tiny parasite feasted upon the American vines without injuring them, the small cicatrice that it leaves being filled with sap and closed as soon as made.

"The Vice President of the Agricultural Society of the Drô, Auguste Tezier, tells me that before this insect invaded France, the annual production of wine was 1,585,020,000 gallons on a land surface of 6,177,500 acres. To-day the surface planted is about 4,102,000 acres. Every year the area planted in vines increases about 30,000 acres. It is expected in a few years that the production of the period preceding the phylloxera will be equaled. In fact, professors of viniculture expect that France will in a few years produce more wine than at any previous time, the methods of cultivation and of vinification having been so perfected as to give to the soil and to the grape the maximum of production.

"No vine can be looked upon as worth cultivation until it is grafted with the American vine, as it is then proof against phylloxera. M. Tezier says the insect always remains where it has once taken up its home, and no one expects it ever to leave France. There will therefore always be a demand for American grafts for France, Algeria, Tunis, Spain, and all other wine-producing countries."

CHICAGO'S NEW ELEVATED ROAD.

First Train Is Run After Years of Delay.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—The first train, inaugurating the passenger service on the new Northwestern Elevated Railroad, was run to-day from the Lincoln Avenue Station around the loop and return. The completion of this road has been delayed for years. The work has been rushed during the last two weeks night and day in order to fulfill the agreement whereby the time for finishing the road was limited to Jan. 1, 1900, under penalty of forfeiting $100,000 to the city.

The stations are not all erected and only one line of track laid. The line taps the north side of the city, which hitherto has been at the mercy of crowded cable and trolley cars. The cost of the work is estimated at $9,000,000.

SPRAYED VINES CAUSE POISON.

Ohio Family Narrowly Escape Death from Mashed Potatoes.

ZANESVILLE, Ohio, Dec. 30.—F. A. Durban and wife and two servants narrowly escaped death by poisoning. At dinner last evening mashed potatoes were served. In the night all were taken seriously ill, and the attending physician pronounced it arsenical poisoning. Six hours' work was required to get the family past the danger point.

Physicians think the poisoning was due to spraying the vines to kill bugs, the plant absorbing the poison.

New Haven's New Lighthouse.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Dec. 30.—Owing to a delay in securing the lighting apparatus for the new lighthouse on the outer breakwater, it will not be ready for service until the middle of next week. The new light is one of the largest along the Sound, and is completely fitted up with modern equipment. It is visible at ten miles' distance. The officials have designated it as the outer lighthouse. Capt. William H. De Luce of Brooklyn, N. Y., has been appointed keeper and Bernard Francisco assistant keeper.

Newport Woman Dies at 103.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWPORT, R. I., Dec. 30.—Mrs. Mary Harrington died this morning, at the age of 103 years. She was born in Castletown, County Cork, Ireland. About fifty-four years ago Mrs. Harrington lost her husband in Castletown during the fever and famine in Ireland, and shortly afterward came to New York with her seven children, two of whom are still living. Later she went to Fall River, where she remained until about twenty-six years ago. Then she came to Newport.

DIES AT STREET CROSSING

G. F. Perrenoud Run Over on One Hundred and Twenty-fifth St.

Mrs. Mary C. McDowell Knocked Out of Harm's Way—Driver of the Wagon Locked Up.

A horse and carriage dashed through the crowd at One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street and Seventh Avenue at 5:45 o'clock last evening and knocked down a man and a woman, killing the man. The victim was Gustavius F. Perrenoud, a public accountant, with an office at 57 New Street, and a residence at 697 West End Avenue. His skull was fractured and he also received internal injuries. His companion, Mrs. Mary C. McDowell, a widow of Washington, D. C., stopping at 127 West Forty-fifth Street, was not hurt. Moses Clenert, twenty-two years old of 1,685 First Avenue, the driver of the horse, was arrested an hour after the accident and locked up.

People were driving to and from the Park, electric cars and wagons were hurriedly passing the corner, and there were many pedestrians at the crossing when a horse drawing a light rig came down Seventh Avenue. Policeman Charles Johnson of the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station saw that the man was having trouble with the horse and the animal was moving at a very fast pace. All the time he kept on coming the horse was moving faster. When the crossing was reached Johnson ran forward to stop the horse, but he was not in time to save Mr. Perrenoud and Mrs. McDowell.

The two tried to step backward as Johnson shouted, and other people uttered involuntary shrieks. The horse hit Mr. Perrenoud first, and he fell against Mrs. McDowell, knocking her out of the way. The horse struck Mr. Perrenoud a second time, and then the carriage hit him. He was insensible when picked up, and the horse was madly racing down the avenue, with the man still pulling on the bit. Johnson was running after him now and calling to him to stop, but the man, horse, and carriage soon disappeared. Mrs. McDowell and Mr. Perrenoud were carried into a drug store at the corner. Mrs. McDowell was hysterical and suffered slightly from shock for a time. But an anxiety to conceal her identity helped her to self-possession, and then she would tell nothing about herself or her companion to the policeman.

An ambulance was sent for, and it soon arrived from the J. Hood Wright Memorial Hospital. Mr. Perrenoud died, however, in a few minutes, and his body was taken to the station house in West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street. The refusal of Mrs. McDowell to tell anything about herself or Mr. Perrenoud led the policeman to insist upon her going to the station house. There she at first refused to talk to Capt. Brown, but finally described herself and admitted her companion was Mr. Perrenoud, which the police had already learned from papers found in his pockets.

Mrs. McDowell said she had gone up town to deliver some New Year's presents, and had met Mr. Perrenoud at a friend's house. He had offered to accompany her to the elevated station at Eighth Avenue and One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, and they were on their way there when the accident happened. She then left the station house.

Clenert was arrested at One Hundred and Twentieth Street and Madison Avenue by Bicycle Policemen Reilly and Gleason. The policemen saw the man driving up the avenue at a frightful rate and gave chase. They followed him for several blocks and finally succeeded in stopping his horse at One Hundred and Twentieth Street. The man was taken to the East One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street Station and locked up, charged with intoxication and reckless driving.

Capt. Brown of the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station later heard of the arrest and, accompanied by some citizens, went over to the station house and identified Clenert as the man whose vehicle had killed Perrenoud. Clenert was then transferred to the West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Station and locked up, charged with homicide.

At 127 West Forty-fifth Street last night it was said that Mrs. McDowell had been stopping there for three weeks. Her home is in Washington, D. C., and she is a native of Virginia.

She left the house yesterday afternoon, unaccompanied, and simply said that she was going to visit friends up town. It was said Mrs. McDowell would not return to the house last night. It was understood she was stopping for the night with a friend up town. Of her companion, who was killed, it was said nothing was known by any one in the house.

At the flat, 697 West End Avenue, where Mr. Perrenoud lived with his aunt, Miss Josephine Bayard, nothing could be learned except that Miss Bayard is in Colorado visiting a sister of Mr. Perrenoud.

PERIL IN BROOKLYN STREETS.

Four Persons Knocked Down and Injured—Mrs. J. Rogers Maxwell in a Runaway.

Four persons were more or less seriously injured by being knocked down by horses in the streets of Brooklyn yesterday afternoon. The first of these accidents occurred at Court and Montague Streets.

James Rulan, thirty years old, and Miss Queen Flanders, sixteen years old, both of 225 South First Street, were crossing Court Street on their way to a Myrtle Avenue car, when they were knocked down by a horse and wagon owned by a liquor dealer on Union Street, and driven by Charles Tracy, twenty-three years old, of 338 Degraw Street. Rulan received a severe scalp wound, and Miss Flanders a fracture of the collarbone. They were attended by an ambulance surgeon from the Brooklyn Hospital and taken home. Tracy drove away after the accident, but was arrested later for reckless driving.

Mrs. J. Rogers Maxwell and Miss Maxwell of 78 Eighth Avenue, the wife and daughter of the well-known yachtsman of that name, figured in the second accident. Mrs. Maxwell, with her daughter and a Miss Titcomb, were being driven up Flatbush Avenue in a closed carriage, when, at Seventh Avenue, the horses became unmanageable and bolted. Several men, including a policeman and a fireman, made ineffectual efforts to stop the team.

Near Eighth Avenue an employe of the Street Cleaning Department who was at work in the street was knocked down by the horses. The man, whose name could not be learned, was carried into a near-by store, where he was attended by an ambulance surgeon from the Seney Hospital. He had apparently been but slightly injured, and was able to go to his home.

The coachman managed to turn his team into Eighth Avenue, and after a run of several blocks on that thoroughfare succeeded in getting the horses under control. Mrs. Maxwell, Miss Maxwell, and Miss Titcomb had remained calmly in their seats during the brief but exciting flight of their carriage. When the horses were brought under control Mrs. Maxwell directed the coachman to drive back to the store into which the street sweeper had been taken, and there saw that the man was properly cared for.

The third accident of the day occurred at Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues. Mrs. Catherine Burns, sixty-seven years old, of Carlton and Myrtle Avenues, in attempting to cross Atlantic Avenue, was knocked down by a horse and wagon. She received a fracture of the left arm, and was taken to the Seney Hospital. The driver of the wagon got away before a policeman could reach the scene.

HEAVY FIRE LOSS IN CHICAGO.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—Fire at an early hour to-day completely gutted the buildings extending from 216 to 222 Monroe Street, badly damaged the building at 212-214 Monroe Street, caused a loss aggregating $950,000, and resulted in the injury of nine firemen, two of them seriously.

The fire is supposed to have originated on the second floor in the workroom of Woolley & Co., wholesale woolens, at 220 and 222 Monroe Street, and, fanned by a fierce northwest wind, spread so rapidly that when the first fire companies arrived on the scene the whole south end of the building was a mass of flames. A second and then a third alarm was sent in, but in spite of the tons of water thrown into the burning buildings by thirty-eight engines and two fire tugs, the wind and the bitter cold so hindered the firemen that for a time the entire wholesale district was in danger. The flames quickly communicated to the building at 216 and 218 Monroe Street, gradually spreading east to 212 and 214 Monroe Street, where its progress was finally checked. Immense brands were carried as far as Twelfth Street, and the firemen were kept busy extinguishing small fires on the roofs of surrounding buildings.

Building at 220-222 Monroe Street; loss, $225,000.

Edwards Stanwood & Co., successors to Phelps, Dodge & Palmer, boots and shoes, third and sixth floors; loss, $200,000.

Woolley & Co., first and second floors, woolen goods; loss, $135,000.

J. W. Butler Paper Company, damage on stock, $250,000; fully insured.

Henry O. Sheppard Company, printers, occupying building at 212-214 Monroe Street; loss, $100,000.

Figures on the insurance are not as yet obtainable, but it is probable that most of the losses are well covered.

RESCUED IN A HEAVY SEA.

GREENPORT, L. I., Dec. 30.—At 1 o'clock this morning the two-masted schooner Rabonni, Capt. Thurston, bound from Providence to New York with a cargo of empty barrels, broke her main topmast while in the middle of Long Island Sound. The wind was blowing a gale, and in attempting to put the boat about her mainmast broke off near the deck, carrying away the foremast. The masts and sails fell to the deck in a confused mass.

The crew of five men and a boy threw out two anchors and started to clear away the wreckage. The wind was too strong and the anchors did not hold. The schooner was blown toward shore, and the cables parted. Shortly afterward, when opposite Peconic, another anchor was thrown out, but this also dragged until within half a mile of the Long Island shore, when it held fast.

Signals of distress were hoisted at daylight, and they were seen by the people on shore, who telephoned to Rocky Point Life-Saving Station. The life-savers loaded their boat on a wagon, and, after borrowing a team of horses, traveled nine miles to Peconic to rescue the men on board the Rabonni. The lifeboat was launched after much difficulty, and with a head sea running it took the life-savers over an hour to reach the schooner. They brought the crew ashore.

The Rabonni carried two small boats, but they were in no condition for launching in a heavy sea. The schooner to-night is dragging her anchor, and will probably go ashore before morning.

BELLEFONTE'S NOTED SPRING.

Flow of Water Sufficient to Supply a City.

BELLEFONTE, Penn., Dec. 30.—The water of Bellefonte's "big spring" has recently undergone an analysis with the most satisfactory results. The present water works were in existence in a rude form in the year 1808, but it was not until 1823 that the right to use the water was donated to the borough by James Harris, one of the founders. From that time to the present the spring has always been owned and controlled by the borough.

The spring discharges 15,000 gallons of water a minute. Between the extremes of heat and cold the water varies but a few degrees. The decline in power of the spring from Summer to Winter is equal to one revolution of the turbine wheel per minute.

The water is forced to the reservoirs to an altitude of 196 feet through a six-inch raised pipe 1,900 feet in length. From this point six-inch pipes run to all parts of the town, making a total of fourteen miles of piping. The consumption per day over the whole town averages about 1,000,000 gallons every twenty-four hours. The output of this spring is sufficient to supply a large city.

A DEWEY ARCH OF ICE.

St. Paul Will Reproduce New York Structure to Honor the Admiral.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Dec. 30.—Admiral Dewey will be invited to St. Paul during Carnival week. His coming will be the central feature promised by the Board of Directors. The Dewey arch and court of honor, that were features in the New York celebration last September, will be reproduced in icy columns. Between the columns and under the arch the marching clubs will pass to a review of the flagship Olympia, also reproduced in ice.

The Chief spectacle will be a bombardment of the gallant cruiser. Within the walls of the frozen ship 300 or 400 men will act the part of the crew, from the man behind the gun to the Captain on the bridge. Land batteries, also constructed of ice, will belch forth skyrockets, Roman candles, and other projectiles upon the Admiral's vessel. After the battle, victory will rest, as it always has, upon the Olympia.

The invitation will be delivered to the Admiral at his Washington home on Monday by United States Senator C. K. Davis. While Admiral Dewey's acceptance is not certain, assurances received from Washington indicate that there is a strong probability that he will accept.

BALL IN NEW COTTON MILL.

Dedication of an Addition to the Berkshire Company's Plant.

Special to The New York Times.

ADAMS, Mass., Dec. 30.—The Berkshire Cotton Manufacturing Company dedicated to-night the new mill, No. 4, with a ball, at which nearly 10,000 persons were present, coming from all parts of Berkshire, and including delegations from Boston and Springfield. The affair took place in the new weave room, which is 530 by 225 feet, the largest in America. Two thousand persons danced in the big room at one time.

President McKinley laid the cornerstone of the mill last Summer while he was the guest of William B. Plunkett, Treasurer and manager of the company. He was invited to be present on this occasion, but was unable to accept. Mr. McKinley also delivered an address at the dedication of Mill No. 3, shortly before he was elected President.

The Boston Festival Orchestra furnished the music for dancing this evening, and Stewart's Military Band of Boston gave a concert from 8 to 9 o'clock. More than 1,000 lights were used in illuminating the room, which was elaborately decorated with bunting, flags, and potted plants. The whole affair was in charge of the operatives of the mill. Governor-elect Crane, who will be inaugurated next week, was present, and assisted Mr. and Mrs. Plunkett in receiving the guests.

Several New York men are interested in this cotton factory. The concern has been very successful from the start. More than 2,500 persons are employed in the mill, and the wages of the employes have been raised 20 per cent. since Dec. 1. So many orders are now on hand that the machinery for the new mill will be put in as soon as possible, so as to start this addition to the plant.

THE OPEN DOOR IN CHINA

European Powers and Japan Favor This Country's Policy.

BRITISH ANSWER THE FIRST

Germany, France, and Russia in Line and a Favorable Reply Now Assured from Italy.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The negotiations opened by Secretary Hay with the great powers of Europe and with Japan toward obtaining a common understanding for a continued open-door policy throughout China have met with success. The State Department is unwilling at present to make public the nature of the replies received, as this information will be embodied in a special message to Congress. But in other quarters thoroughly reliable and in a position to have trustworthy and accurate information it is learned that favorable responses have been made by Great Britain, Germany, France, Japan, and Russia, the Russian communication having been received yesterday. There is no doubt, it is thought here, that Italy, the remaining country addressed, will make a favorable answer. The position of Italy is felt to be assured by the course adopted by the other four great powers of Europe.

The importance of this unanimous verdict by all the first-class powers of the world—Great Britain, Russia, Germany, France, Italy, and Japan, in conjunction with the United States—can hardly be overestimated, so far as it relates to the future of China and the commerce of the world in that empire. The State Department is loath to discuss the far-reaching results to be obtained when the agreement advances to the stage of formal consummation. Each favorable response is conditioned on the favorable action of all the other parties, so that in each case the negotiations may be regarded as short of absolute finality. But while the department is silent, the details come from sources believed to be fully conversant with what has occurred.

According to this information the British answer was the first to be submitted, and was exceptionally comprehensive and explicit in yielding to every suggestion made by the United States relative to maintaining the freest entry to the ports of China. The British answer is said to emphasize the concurrence with the United States by adopting word for word much of the phraseology employed by Secretary Hay when he addressed his original note to Great Britain and the other powers. The wording is such as to make it plain that the British Government concurs, for the present and hereafter, without limitation, in a policy of free access to China.

Although much secrecy was observed in the transmission of the British answer, its general purport soon became known at the other European capitals, and there was not a little irritation at what was regarded as a precipitate response, purposely designed to embarrass the Continental powers by showing Great Britain and the United States acting in concert, while the rest of the world held aloof. But this situation was made much more satisfactory to the Continental powers by their determination to act for themselves. Germany is said to have been the next power to answer in the affirmative. The German answer was rather more vague than the one which had preceded it, but its general tendency was favorable, the only condition being that any arrangement as to free access to China should be universal and assented to by all of the powers.

The French answer is understood to have come next, and the circumstances attending it were rather peculiar. While not in the nature of a direct answer, the result was regarded as most satisfactory. Secretary Hay's note had been forwarded to Gen. Horace Porter, the United States Ambassador to France, who promptly called upon M. Delcasse, Minister of Foreign Affairs in the French Cabinet. Gen. Porter made known his mission, whereupon M. Delcasse showed the most sympathetic spirit, and said that he had already made ample answer to just such a communication, although at the time he had not intended it as an answer to the American note.

This answer, M. Delcasse explained, was given in a speech made by him on Nov. 24 in the French Chamber. The main point of that speech, in its references to China, was that France desired the most ample freedom of commerce. M. Delcasse referred Gen. Porter to this speech, and told him that it fully gave the assurance which the United States desired. It is said that the meeting was gratifying on both sides, and that the results were considered to be a fav

GERMAN STEAMER SEIZED

Alleged to Have Been Carrying Recruits to the Boers.

HAMBURG MERCHANTS PROTEST

Government at Berlin Asked to Intervene at Once to Demand the Release of the Captive Vessel.

DURBAN, Dec. 29.—The British cruiser Magicienne has seized in Delagoa Bay the German steamship Bundesrath, of 1,319 tons, which sailed from Hamburg Nov. 8 for Tanga, East Africa. She will be brought before a prize court. It is learned that there were three German officers and twenty men, attired in khaki and intending to serve the Boers, on board the Bundesrath, which explains her capture.

HAMBURG, Dec. 30.—The Directors of the German East African Line have received news of the arrest of the imperial mail steamer Bundesrath. The commander of the port of Durban refused an explanation of the cause of the seizure, but it is declared here that there was no contraband of war on board, and when application was made to the German Foreign Office the latter immediately promised interposition with the British Government.

The seizure was referred to at a meeting of merchants held here to-day. After a speech by Herr Adolph Woermann, President of the Hamburg Chamber of Commerce, dealing with the great progress of the German Empire during the closing century, Herr Eiffe, speaking in behalf of the firms trading with South Africa, asked whether the Chamber was doing all that was necessary for the protection of German trade in that part of the world. German commerce, he asserted, had already suffered detriment through the war in South Africa, and now news came of the seizure of a German steamer by a British warship.

Herr Woermann replied that the Chamber had already considered the question of representations with the view of taking action in the matter. The Chamber, he continued, had been informed that the steamship company owning the seized vessel had telegraphed to Prince Hohenlohe, the Imperial Chancellor, asking for Government intervention, and it was declared that nothing whatever had been done by the company which could in any way be regarded as a breach of neutrality.

The Handelsblatt publishes reports of interviews with Dr. Leyds, in the course of which the Transvaal representative denies the statements that munitions of war are being imported into the Transvaal through Delagoa Bay, and says these reports are spread as a pretext for the coming British occupation. Dr. Leyds further says that the Boers are now able to manufacture their own war munitions.

LORENZO MARQUES, Dec. 30.—The capture of the Bundesrath has increased the already strong anti-British feeling here of the Hollander and German section of the population.

OPPOSED TO FLOUR SEIZURES.

Copyright, 1899, The Associated Press.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The seizure of cargoes of American flour off Delagoa Bay fail to excite much popular interest in England. It is generally looked upon as a fine point of international law that will be amicably settled. So far no official steps in the matter have been taken, owing to the non-arrival of the necessary papers from Washington. The military and international law authorities are almost unanimous in declaring that Great Britain should not declare foodstuffs contraband of war.

The Naval and Military Record, under this head, says to-day:

"Fully 50 per cent. of our food comes from America, the colonies, and other countries We have ceased to make any effort to be self-supporting. This condition constitutes a danger only bearable because of our confidence in the strength of the British Navy and in the friendship and self-interest of the United States. The States may be counted on to fill our larder in both peace and war, but so essential have American supplies become to our safety that we must take no step likely to lead to an interruption of the enormous supply of foodstuffs. Our enemies on the Continent would rejoice if we intercepted the foodstuffs now passing into the Transvaal via Delagoa Bay. A dangerous precedent would thus be created, which would be used against England at the first opportunity."

A correspondent learns that the wireless telegraph instruments recently captured from the Boers and described as Marconi's were not his manufacture. They were made by a well-known German firm, whom Marconi once employed to experiment with plans he afterward discarded. Marconi declares the instruments captured were not workable. Some feeling has been caused against the young inventor by the first report, the belief spreading that he had broken his agreement to supply only the British during the present war.

Regarding traffic generally on the east coast of Africa, the British Admiralty officials say the British Government desires that all ordinary and legitimate trade conducted by foreign vessels should suffer as little restriction as possible.

GREAT BRITAIN'S FOES AT WORK?

BERLIN, Dec. 30.—It is reported in Government circles that Germany does not believe the report that Great Britain intends to take decisive steps soon at Delagoa Bay.

It is admitted that Germany would be informed beforehand if any serious step was intended, and the reports circulated are considered to be balloons dessai issued by the countries interested in preventing Great Britain from getting Delagoa Bay.

REVOLT IMMINENT IN PORTUGAL.

PARIS, Dec. 30.—Advices received in diplomatic circles here say the republicans of Portugal have seized on the alleged Anglo-German-Portuguese secret treaty as a weapon to attack the monarchy, asserting that it is evidence of the monarchy's weakness and willingness to sell the Portuguese colonies to fill the depleted coffers of the Treasury.

The Figaro says:

"King Charles probably will lose his crown if he acquiesces to England's proposal, even under menace."

An interesting piece of diplomatic gossip is that the Portuguese Minister in London is a great friend of the Prince of Wales, and in order to please him practically assured Lord Salisbury that British troops would be permitted to pass through Lorenzo Marques. But it is added, when the matter was brought to the attention of the home Government it repudiated the Minister's action.

BLAME PUT ON CHAMBERLAIN.

Copyright, 1899, by The Associated Press.

BERLIN, Dec. 30.—The South African war overshadows everything else here. A correspondent has just had an interesting interview with the Liberal leader, Dr. Barth, who is one of the most steadfast friends of Great Britain and America, but who also condemns this war. Dr. Barth said:

"At present it looks as if England might lose the whole of South Africa. I have private information from Africa, via Holland, according to which the rebellious movement among the Cape Boers has assumed much more serious proportions than the English newspapers admit. There never was a greater piece of political stupidity than that shown by Mr. Chamberlain in provoking war without having made the necessary military preparations. If England had only waited a few years she could have had everything without war.

"If England is totally defeated this war will be the best thing for the world, even for England. It will be a lesson she will not soon forget. It will have a wholesome influence upon the jingoes of all countries, including the German. Our navy scheme, which is almost sure of adoption, must be understood to be in connection with the war in South Africa, all fine phrases offered in explanation notwithstanding. The increase was decided upon because Germany has lost confidence in the men who are shaping England's policy. The brutality of the present English policies renders Germany's position too insecure.

"What happens in the Transvaal to-day on land may happen to Germany upon the sea to-morrow. Distrust of England makes it necessary for Germany to be so strong at sea that the English jingoes will think twice before attacking Germany. If the English statesmen of to-day were of the type of Gladstone and Morley we should have no concern, but with such political jack-o'-lanterns as Mr. Chamberlain at the helm we do not know what to expect, and must arm for any eventuality."

The German press generally, during the last few days, has expressed the opinion that Great Britain will lose not only the war but also South Africa.

A military writer in the Deutsche Tages-Zeitung says:

"It is no longer a question of whether England will not subjugate the Boer republics, but of whether she will also lose Cape Colony. It is true England will retain the harbors, for they lie under the guns of English ships, but the entire interior she will lose, and, instead of the dreamed-of enormous British South African empire, England will only keep a number of ports. This will probably be the issue of the war, if England does not hurry up and conclude peace."

AMERICAN FRIENDSHIP SOUGHT

Great Britain and the Transvaal Both Eager to Gain the Support of the United States.

Copyright, 1899, by The Associated Press.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—It is strange to note that as the new year dawns for Great Britain the greatest army she ever put in the field remains passive in South Africa, held at bay by two of the smallest republics on the face of the earth, while at home, in spite of the large volume of trade and apparent prosperity, her financial interests are in a state of instability not seen since the Baring crash. All Europe is yelping at her heels, and the necessity for America's friendship is recognized on all sides. Papers and people who for years have been ready with a gibe for Americas good-will no longer make any attempt to belittle the desirability of securing her friendship.

"America," says The Globe, usually humorous at the expense of all things transatlantic, "with a crop of 542,000,000 bushels, is especially in a position to help us."

The economic shoe already begins to pinch the military foot. Not very seriously, but enough to suggest grave cogitations as to what would happen if Great Britain were at war with a great power. The fact that the Government has chartered so many transports has resulted in a rise in the price of bread, while coal is rising by leaps and bounds to famine prices. It is such unpleasant results as these that silence the scoffer at things American and induce such a vituperative publication as The Saturday Review to say:

"The Americans have had their eyes opened to the possibilities of a foreign policy and are taking a sounder, because a cooler, view of the situation. They are not less friendly to us than before, but the insincere element has been eliminated, and has left a stable substratum of good-will."

Which concatenation The Saturday Review, under different circumstances, would doubtless have construed into damning evidence of the insincerity of American friendship.

It must not be inferred that this view is held by many of the sincere English friends of America, who now point to what they are pleased to term its great friendliness as proof of what they have always maintained.

With such a serious outlook for the coming year, it is hardly surprising that articles appear under the heading, "Are We Decadent?" and similar strains. On the other hand there is still a small section of the press and public which devotes its energies to senselessly abusing the Boers and prophesying the speedy entry of the British into Pretoria. Yet, on the whole, the organs voicing the better class of opinion face 1900 and its eventualities in South Africa with an even-minded, unhysterical determination that compels admiration. That there will be a day of reckoning for some one is certainty, but even the most guarded and conservative do not try to conceal. Whether it be Lord Landsdowne, Lord Wolseley, or Gen. Buller it is impossible to tell. But all the information obtainable at present and the gist of criticisms point to Lord Landsdowne having to shoulder the onus for the terrible mismanagement.

While Great Britain feeds contentedly upon long special cables showing American friendship, the Boer agents in Europe believe sentiment in the United States has been gradually turning Boerward, until the time is now ripe to develop it into material effect. Under this impression it is learned that they are contemplating dispatching a special mission to the United States for the purpose of influencing public opinion, possibly by open meetings and by personally assisting the efforts of those in Congress whom they believe friendly. Moreover, they consider it advisable to offset what they declare has been a systematic campaign of Mr John Hays Hammond, the American engineer who was a member of the Johannesburg Reform Committee, to influence Washington opinion. If the plans now under consideration are carried out the mission will include a very prominent Boer agent and a pro-Boer member of the British Parliament, who intended to sail this week, but was prevented by what is thought to be a temporary hitch in the arrangements. Their desire is to affiliate themselves with no particular party, but, by influencing political and public opinion, to secure at least an offer of mediation from the United States.

A correspondent has made careful inquiries but failed to find any circumstance to warrant the belief that such an offer, however made, would receive the slightest consideration.

FRESH ACTIVITY AT LADYSMITH.

Believed that Gen. Buller Is Preparing for a New Attack.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The reported sortie from Ladysmith, resulting in the capture of a Boer position, is not confirmed, and apparently is only a Kafir story. A Chieveley dispatch, dated Dec. 29, makes no mention of it. The same message shows renewed activity upon the part of the British, apparently preparatory to some action. The Boer position eastward of the camp was thoroughly reconnoitred Dec. 28, without drawing the enemy.

The naval guns engaged in daily practice, and it is said on good authority that thirty or forty Boers have been killed by the firing during two days.

A dispatch from Durban predicts that Ladysmith will be relieved on or about Jan. 7. While there is nothing to bear out this forecast there is some disposition to believe Gen. Buller is preparing another attempt to advance this time by an attack on the Boer position on Inhlawe Mountain.

During the night of Dec. 28 Ladysmith and Chieveley Camp were in full communication, the former reporting "All well." While the signaling was in progress, the Boers attempted to muddle the messages with flashlights from each extremity of their long, intrenched line. The Naval Brigade took advantage of the opportunity to shell the Boer positions, which were plainly revealed by their own lights. The Naval Battery resumed the shelling of the Boer trenches on the morning of Dec. 29, but their fire failed to elicit any sign of life.

A dispatch from Cape Town, dated Dec. 27, announced that an armored train had restored communication with Dordrecht, where the Free State flag had been hauled down, and that the Boers had been driven from the adjacent hills to Stormberg.

GEN. BULLER ORDERED TO WAIT.

Believed He Was Told Not to Move Till Roberts Arrives.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The impression continues to gain ground that Gen. Buller and his subordinates have been instructed to undertake no important movement until the arrival of Gen. Roberts, and that Roberts will amalgamate the divisions under Gens. Gatacre, Warren, and French, subsequently marching upon Bloemfontein to capture that place and draw off the Boers from Ladysmith.

To accomplish this, it is believed that Kimberley and Mafeking may be sacrificed. Whether Gen. Buller will acquiesce in this arrangement is seriously doubted by many who know him, and they are rather inclined to believe he will attempt to emulate Gen. Gough, who, under similar circumstances, retrieved his reverses in India while Sir Charles Napier was coming out to supersede.

BOERS SEND HOLIDAY GREETINGS.

PRETORIA, Dec. 30.—Ten unloaded shells inscribed "The Season's Greetings" have been fired at Ladysmith.

No answer has been received.

KIMBERLEY GREETS THE QUEEN.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The War Office issues a dispatch dated Cape Town Dec. 29, evening, saying that Col. Kekewich wired, through the General commanding at Modder River, on Dec. 28, as follows:

"I am desired by the Mayor and Council to forward the following for transmission through the proper channel:

"'To her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen: The inhabitants of Kimberley beg to send your Majesty New Year's greetings. The trouble they have passed through and are still enduring only tends to love and loyalty toward your Majesty's throne and person.

"'R. H. HENDERSON, Mayor,
"'On behalf of the inhabitants.'"

The War Office also issues the following, addressed to the Secretary of State for War:

"Please send the following to Col. Kekewich for communication to the Mayor and Council from the Queen:

"'I am deeply touched by your kind and loyal New Year's greetings. I watch with admiration your determination and gallant defense, though I regret the unavoidable loss of life incurred.'"

METHUEN SHELLS THE BOERS.

Steady Bombardment Proceeding at the Modder River.

PRETORIA, Dec. 29.—A dispatch from the Boer camp at Modder River, dated Dec. 28, reports an artillery duel lasting an hour.

On Dec. 27 a British reconnoitring party made a sortie, but did not come within the Boer range.

The British, Dec. 28, commenced a steady bombardment of the Boer position.

Two British Captains Killed.

PRETORIA, Dec. 29.—Three British prisoners from Malapo report that Capts. Vernon and Sandford of Col. Baden-Powell's staff were killed during the engagement in which Lords Edward Cecil and Cavendish-Bentinck were wounded. The object of the sortie was to capture Boer cannon. The loss of the British were very severe.

MOVEMENT OF BOERS CHECKED.

British Troops Frustrate an Attempt to Cut a Railroad.

CAPE TOWN, Dec. 29.—The troops in the British camp of Victoria West turned out last night to repel an attempt of the Boers to cut the railroad near the station.

A patrol reported early in the evening that they had sighted the Boers in the neighborhood.

At 10 o'clock at night the Boers opened a heavy fire near the station. The British replied, and the Boers retired at daybreak, their attempt having turned out a failure.

LIKES MRS. KRUGER'S DESSERT

Conyngham Greene Tells the Queen Stories of the Domestic Life of Oom Paul's Wife.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—During the recent visit to Windsor of Mr. Conyngham Greene, former British Agent at Pretoria, Queen Victoria asked him a lot of questions regarding Mrs. Krüger, her housekeeping and personal characteristics.

Mr. Greene entertained her Majesty with incidents showing the simplicity of Mrs. Krüger's home life and her personal attention to kitchen duties, detailing with special zest upon the excellence of a certain dessert which Mrs. Krüger makes.

WEDDINGS HASTENED BY THE WAR.

Copyright, 1899, The Associated Press.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The death of the Duke of Westminster, combined with the mourning already prevalent on account of the war losses, left few of the titled families of Great Britain free to celebrate Christmas week with the usual festivities. The Grosvenor family has so many ramifications among the nobility and such a large number of other titled people have recently died that one would almost think the Court was in mourning.

To this condition of affairs a pathetic paradox is found in the society news columns, which daily announce a long list of forthcoming marriages, the bridegrooms, in a majority of the cases, being soldiers. It is a season of short engagements and sudden deaths. Momentarily expecting orders to sail for South Africa, the British officers have apparently taken the opportunity of "striking while the iron is hot," and many a quiet marriage is now followed within a few days by a farewell at Southampton.

For instance, Major Maxse, who took part in the recent defeat of the Khalifa, returned to England, married Lord Leconfield's daughter, and is now on his way to the Cape.

DUKE OF NORFOLK VOLUNTEERS.

Great Britain's Leading Peer Would Go to South Africa.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The martial spirit and universal desire to serve the country at the front shows no signs of abating. The action of England's Premier Duke, the Duke of Norfolk, who is Postmaster General, and by no means a young man, (he was born in 1847,) in volunteering for active service is the latest example of the spirit which pervades all classes. The Duke of Norfolk's position in the Cabinet and his tremendous business interests, to say nothing of his power as lay head of the Catholic Church in England, will probably prevent the acceptance of his offer.

No little comment has been caused by the War Office's tardy recognition of the engineers and artillery. Until Gen. Warren of the engineers was sent out, all the general officers in the field were cavalrymen or infantrymen. The country howled for Gen. Warren's appointment, and, at last, the man who knows South African topography better than any other General received recognition. Then followed, in quick succession, Gen. Roberts, an artillery man, and Gens. Kitchener and Chermside, engineers, until the campaign now bids fair to be chiefly directed by the hitherto neglected "gunners and sappers."

Among the latest distinguished men going to South Africa is Capt. Holford, who is one of the closest friends of the Prince of Wales and his equerry. The Captain sails Jan. 6 to join his regiment, the First Life Guards. From 1888 to 1892 Capt. Holford was equerry to the late Duke of Clarence, and since then has been equerry to the Prince of Wales. He is a wealthy land owner and proprietor of Dorchester House, London, famous for its picture galleries.

Ceylon Planters Volunteer.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The Government has accepted 125 Ceylon volunteers, mostly planters, and has also accepted the offers of Indian Princes to supply horses.

MR. HAY LEAVES FOR HIS POST.

New American Consul to Pretoria Sails for South Africa.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—Adelbert S. Hay, the new United States Consul at Pretoria, left Waterloo Railroad Station here, this morning, for Southampton, on his way to Cape Town. Mr. Hay is charged with many commissions from relatives and friends of the British prisoners at Pretoria.

The same train took Lord Edward Stanley, one of the Junior Lords of the Treasury, and edest son of Earl Derby, formerly Governor General of Canada. Lord Stanley has been appointed to a position on Gen. Roberts's staff.

WILL OBSERVE BOER MOVEMENTS.

United States Military Attache to be Sent to the Transvaal.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—Learning that the French and Germans and perhaps other nations had military officers accompanying the Boer armies as observers, the War Department felt that it would like the same privilege for an expert of its own. Mr. Hollis, United States Consul at Pretoria, was accordingly directed to ask President Krueger if he would allow an American officer to accompany the troops.

A cablegram has just been received from the Consul saying that the Boer Government has courteously assented to the request. The War Department will at once select a suitable man for the place and he will be hurried to the scene of hostilities.

Beef for British Soldiers.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—A train of twenty-eight cars loaded with corned beef will leave Hammond, Ind., Sunday night, bound for the British soldiers in South Africa. The shipment was sold to the British Government by the Hammond Packing Company. It is said that other local concerns have large orders which will soon be sent away.

Protest Against Insurance Companies.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—Advices from Cape Town say there is great dissatisfaction there at the action of the British insurance companies, who are retarding volunteering by making policy holders pay war risk premiums, while the agencies of the leading American companies allow perfect freedom for naval and military service.

Many Volunteers at Winnipeg.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Dec. 30.—A special from Winnipeg says: Major Williams of the Royal Canadian Dragoons stated to-day that he had received no fewer than 490 applications for enlistment for active service with the imperial forces in South Africa, the majority being from ex-soldiers and ex-mounted policemen. Eighty-four non-commissioned officers and men and four officers are all that are allowed from Manitoba. The local contingent will leave Winnipeg Jan. 6 to join the Canadian forces at Halifax.

Patti Will Sing for the War Fund.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—Mme. Patti heads the list of prominent artists who will sing at Covent Garden Feb. 22, under the patronage of the Marchioness of Lansdowne, in aid of the wives and families of officers killed during the war. On the same occasion the Duchess of Marlborough will recite a patriotic poem.

Expedition to the Transvaal.

The North German Lloyd steamship Werra was not able to sail for Naples yesterday, but will start at 10:30 o'clock this morning. It was reported that she will take out a party of fifty men under the guidance of H. G. M. L. Adriesse, who will go from Naples to Lorenzo Marques, in Delagoa Bay, and after procuring passports will cross the country into the Transvaal, where they will go into the Red Cross service in the Boer-English war.

SEIZURE OF BOER BUTTONS.

Shipped from New Jersey and Found in Canada.

OTTAWA, Ontario, Dec. 30.—A large number of buttons, on which are inscribed the words: "Victory to the Boers," both in French and in English, were recently seized by the customs officials in Toronto and forwarded to the department here. All importations of the character mentioned are declared to be seditious under the customs act and are therefore prohibited.

The buttons were being sent to Toronto and Montreal people. They were manufactured in New Jersey.

TRANSVAAL SYMPATHIZERS MEET.

Toast in Cincinnati to the United States of South Africa.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—A special to The Tribune from Cincinnati says:

"At a meeting of the Transvaal sympathizers held last night a toast to 'the United States of South Africa' was proposed by the Chairman, who mentioned the members of the future Government, Natal, Cape Colony, Orange Free State, Transvaal, and Swaziland.

"Mr. von Alitow, a relative of President Krüger, arrived from New York City in time to make a speech, in the course of which he said:

"'We have now 4,000 Americans, well drilled in Pretoria, with 2,000 more on the way. Funds are coming from all parts of this broad land. We may need 50,000 men, but we are satisfied that we can have them on time, even with the English blockade.'

"Contributions to the amount of several thousand dollars were made in secret session. A badge was adopted, with the motto 'United States of South Africa,' in the shape of a Maltese cross, the names of different States inscribed in red, orange, and blue."

AMERICAN WOMAN FLEES.

Driven from Johannesburg and Forced to Leave Her Valuables.

DEADWOOD, S. D., Dec. 30.—Mrs. Celia Rees, formerly Miss Bueter, whose parents reside in this city, has written them from Durban, Natal, confirming her marriage to W. J. Rees, a diamond king of Johannesburg, and stating that they have fled from their home to Durban, Natal, which is now crowded with refugees from the South African cities. She says in part:

"We had intended to take a trip to India, but the war came on, and we had to flee to this place, leaving all of our household goods at Johannesburg, which is now only occupied by a few Dutch women and looting parties. Many people had to leave with only the clothing they wore. The Dutch say that if they lose the day they will burn Johannesburg and blow the mines to atoms."

Transport for Canadian Troops.

HALIFAX, N. S., Dec. 30.—The steamer Laurentian, which arrived last night, will be the first of the three transports, carrying the second Canadian contingent to South Africa, to sail. She is expected to leave Halifax Jan. 13, and will take 314 men, with some members of the staff, and 315 horses.

YEAR'S GOOD AND BAD DEEDS.

Record High for Public Gifts and Low for Dishonesty.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—The Tribune to-morrow will say:

"Among all the records of the year 1899 not one stands out so conspicuously as that of the donations and bequests made for religion, educational institutions, charity, libraries, museums and galleries, and to cities for popular benefit and entertainment. No year in the history of this country has ever equaled it. The aggregate thus bestowed is $79,749,956, as compared with $23,984,900 in 1898 and $33,612,814 in 1897. In the preparation of the statistics no record has been kept of donations or bequests of less than $1,000.

"Of the total amount stated above there has been given to educational institutions $55,851,817; to charities, $13,206,676; to churches, $2,992,593; to museums and art galleries, $2,686,500, and to libraries, $5,012,400.

"The record of embezzling, forgery, defaulting, and bank wrecking was the smallest in the last twenty-one years. The total is $2,218,373, compared with $5,851,263 in 1898 and $11,248,084 in 1897."

SCENIC ARTIST'S TROUBLES.

James Grace, Endowed with Legacy and Pension, Victim of Exposure.

James Grace, sixty years old, was found by the police on Wednesday night on the Bowery suffering from the effects of liquor and exposure. At Bellevue Hospital he said that his best friend was Frank B. Murtha, formerly manager of the Murray Hill Theatre. From Bellevue he was removed to Manhattan Hospital, on Blackwell's Island.

A man who said that he represented Mr. Murtha, visited Bellevue Hospital yesterday afternoon and stated that Grace had been left some money by wealthy relatives, but it had been placed in the hands of Mr. Murtha, who was to give Grace $1 a day. During the last few days Grace had failed to call for the money, and this had led Mr. Murtha to look for him. The alleged friend got permission to call up Manhattan Hospital by Telephone, and was told that Grace's condition was serious. He told the hospital authorities to give the man all the help needed, as he had money to pay for whatever extra attention he received. The man said that Grace was well connected, and had been a scenic artist of great ability. He was capable of earning a large salary, but for many years had done nothing.

A man who has known Grace for the last twenty years said last night that Grace was a relative of Mrs. Murtha and had been an iron molder. He served in the Union Army during the civil war and receives a pension. Years ago his wifes clothing caught fire in her home and she was burned to death. Grace was burned and disfigured in trying to save her. Since her death he had done very little. In 1880 he was for five weeks assistant to Artist Bowles in the Windsor Theatre.

A well-dressed man, who was only able to give his name and address, was stricken with appoplexy in front of 20 Desbrosses Street last evening and taken to Hudson Street Hospital in an ambulance. There he lapsed into unconsciousness, and it is feared by the surgeons that he will die. The name he gave, and which is borne out by papers in his pockets, was L. B. Girardeau, forty-five years old, of 102 Palisade Avenue, Hoboken, N. J.

CUBAN COLONISTS SAIL.

Three Hundred Men from All Parts of the United States Start for La Gloria.

It was a remarkable company that sailed yesterday from Pier 6 North River on the steamship Yarmouth. It consisted of men only—over 300 in number and from all parts of the United States. There were lawyers, merchants, small tradesmen of all kinds, mechanics, and farmers. They expect to become the progenitors of future generations of colonial sons and dames in the Island of Cuba. The farmers, tradesmen, and mechanics were most numerous, but it was noticed that most of those who were not mechanics were supplied with tools—carpenters' and a general assortment.

The Yarmouth takes out what may be said to be the first American colonists to Cuba, and their destination is La Gloria, the site of the new colony, which is being founded by the Cuban Land and Steamship Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and with headquarters in this city. The colonists are all stockholders, and are apparently confident that great opportunities await them in the Pearl of the Antilles.

La Gloria lies about thirty miles west of Nuevitas, on the north coast of the island, in the Province of Puerto Principe. It includes some 90,000 acres of land. The colonists said that while they were not going to moor their bark in some fern and rock-bound coast, they were not looking forward to a life of tropic luxury amid orange groves and bananas.

The land which they are to settle is a wilderness, they said, as wild as that which offered its rugged hospitality to the Pilgrim fathers of old, though fortunately less cold. It is heavily wooded or brush-grown, and they expect to subdue it to the needs of agriculture with the axe and the plow.

The kind of a life which they expect to live was indicated by the character of their belongings, which pretty well filled the vessel's hold. It should be said that only about half of those who go expect to remain this trip. The others go to investigate. But those who go to settle now were provided with tents and a full camp outfit.

One young tailor from Binghamton said he had invested his savings, amounting to about $75, in the enterprise. This included the cost of transportation, his outfit, and the first payment on his stock in the company, which entitles him also to a bit of land. He takes along a tailoring outfit and some carpenter's tools as well. There were eight others in his party, including a baker, a stove dealer, who took some stoves with him; a cigar maker, who expects to find his material in Cuba, and others of various trades.

There was a business man from the State of Washington, who goes to see what the prospects are, and an Oklahoma settler, who says he made a good thing of it in the West and thinks he may do equally well in Cuba. While all nationalities were represented, the party was made up in the main of Americans, and the farming element was strong. The oddest things taken aboard, comparatively speaking, were a peanut roaster and a bicycle. Many of the tradesmen took along stocks of wares for which they expect there will be a demand. One had several barrels containing bottled beer.

A regular steamship service is to be maintained between this port and La Gloria, vessels sailing from here every two weeks. The Yarmouth belongs to the Yarmouth Steamship Company, and plies in the Nova Scotian passenger service in Summer.

No women were allowed to go on the first trip, as a hotel which is under construction will not be ready until next month, and it was thought inadvisable to permit of their being subjected to the roughing it that will be the lot of this first installment. Thirty women are, however, booked for the next trip.

There was a large party of friends to see the colonists off, and among others were many rosy cheeked country girls who appeared greatly interested in the steamship, many never having seen one before. One old farmer was heard to say: "I have crossed the lakes, but I declare I never saw the ocean before."

Owing to delay in getting coal aboard the Yarmouth, which was scheduled to sail at 3 o'clock, did not get away until after 8 o'clock last night.

REAL ESTATE SOLD FOR $465,000.

Newport Place and the McLean Estate Change Hands.

W. E. & F. B. Taylor have sold for David H. King, Jr., his place at Newport, R. I., known as "Whitehall," together with stables, &c., at $150,000.

The same brokers also sold for Daniel F. Cohalan and others, the plot of ninety acres at Woodlawn Heights, about 400 feet north of the New York City line, known as the McLean estate, for $315,000.

HEALTH BOARD STATISTICS.

Brooklyn the Healthiest Borough—City Population 3,550,053.

The Board of Health yesterday gave out some statistics for the year ended yesterday. The five boroughs of the city are treated separately, and according to the death rate figures Brooklyn is the healthiest borough in New York. The death rate percentages for the five boroughs are as follows: Manhattan, 18.49; Bronx, 22.61; Brooklyn, 17.56; Queens, 18.67, and Richmond, 18.79. The percentage for the five boroughs together is 18.37.

The total number of deaths during the year was 65,218, against 65,804 last year. There were 23,750 deaths of children under five years, 15,364 under one year, 8,922 sixty-five years and over, 15,544 deaths in institutions and 35,734 deaths in tenements. There were 77,648 births and 30,470 marriages reported during the year. The number of deaths from pneumonia was 8,529, against 7,485 for 1898, more than from any other disease. There were 629 suicides, against 693 for 1898, and 131 homicides, against 115 during the previous year.

The statistics give the estimated population for the city for the year 1898 as being 3,438,899, and for 1899 3,550,053.

Charity Society Appeals.

The Charity Organization Society renews its recent appeals for the following cases: One hundred dollars toward the support of a middle-aged single woman who is without friends able to help her, burdered as she is with members of her family for the sake of whom she has sacrificed herself and the care of whom has drained her resources. Her father is very old, and one of her brothers is seriously ill. The case is urgent and pitiful; $300 to pay the entrance fee into a home for a widow verging on eighty years of age, who is now dependent and has no friends able to support her. The society acknowledges with many thanks the following contributions received for these cases: "E. L. M.," $30; "N. E. C." and "C. M. H.," $25 each; "H. D." N. Witherell, S. M. Lehman, and K. Otani, $10 each; "C. P. S." $2; J. Gould's Son & Co. and "J. C. E." $1 each. Money in response to these appeals may be sent to the Charity Organization Society, 105 East Twenty-second Street.

FIRE AT ULMER PARK.

Property Belonging to William Texter Damaged $10,000 Worth.

A fire which lighted up the shores of Gravesend Bay, Brooklyn, and offered a fine spectacle, occurred early last evening in a two-story building on the Ulmer Park property, at Harway and Twenty-fifth Avenues. The building contained an electric light and ice-making plant, and was also used as a storehouse. The origin of the fire is not known. The intense cold had frozen the water in the hydrants in the neighborhood, and the firemen were greatly hampered.

The close proximity of several large pavilions and a hotel made the fire a dangerous one, but the firemen succeeded in confining the blaze to the building in which it started. The loss was estimated at about $10,000. William Texter is the owner of the building.

EX-CONVICTS' HOME IN FLUSHING

Mrs. Booth Does Not Understand Why There Should Be Opposition.

MONTCLAIR, N J., Dec. 30.—Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth is still confined to her room with an attack of heart trouble. She could not be seen to-night, but Miss Hughes, her secretary, in answer to a question as to what Mrs. Booth intended to do in view of the reported opposition to the establishment of a home for ex-convicts at Flushing, L. I., said:

"Mrs. Booth does not understand why there should be any opposition to the proposed settlement in Flushing. It is not an experiment, as we have had a colony of ex-convicts in New York City for three years and have never had any trouble."

Miss Hughes said one of the rules of the home in New York is that all inmates must be in before dark, and one violation of that rule bars the offender forever from the privileges of the institution. This rule will be enforced at the new home.

Mrs. Booth expects to take possession of the Flushing property shortly, and about forty ex-convicts will be taken there.

JUSTICE BARNARD RETIRES.

Leaves the Supreme Court Bench After Serving Thirty-six Years.

Special to The New York Times.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Dec. 30.—After thirty-six years of continuous service on the bench of the Supreme Court in this State, Justice Joseph F. Barnard to-day brought to a close his judicial career. He was elected to the bench in 1863 for eight years, re-elected in 1871 for a term of fourteen years, and again re-elected in 1885 for a term of fourteen years. The age limit overtook him in 1893, and he has served since by appointment of the Governor under a provision especially inserted in the last Constitution of the State to meet his case. The term for which he was last elected having expired, he will not be eligible for assignment next year.

Justice Barnard was born in Nantucket, Mass., in 1823. He was graduated from Yale College in 1841, and was admitted to the bar in 1844, after which he practiced law in this city until his elevation to the bench in 1863. In 1870 he was appointed by the Governor Presiding Justice of the General Term of this department. His last two elections were not opposed. It is estimated that Judge Barnard has tried more than 100,000 issues of law and fact.

Fifty members of the bar assembled this morning to bid him farewell as a Judge. Addresses were made by William H. Wood and Allison Butts, to which Justice Barnard responded.

GRIGGS REFUSES TO ACT

Returns Shippers' Protest to the Commerce Commission.

SAYS NO WRONG IS SHOWN

Asserts that Objectors Must Show a Contract, Combination, or Conspiracy to Make a Case.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—Attorney General Griggs to-day returned to the Inter-State Commerce Commission the transcript of the evidence taken at a hearing before the commission last week in the matter of the new freight classification, with the statement that the matter is one for action by the commission, and not by the Attorney General. The Attorney General says:

"I am in receipt of your communication of the 28th inst., and have given the matter such careful consideration as the limited time at my command has permitted.

"It appears that on the 8th inst. the Inter-State Commerce Commission ordered an inquiry with respect to certain charges in freight classification made by official classification No. 20, which is to take effect Jan. 1, 1900. At the conclusion of the testimony taken at the hearing on the 21st and 22d inst. certain protesting shippers requested that a transcript of the proceedings be transmitted to the Attorney General, claiming that a violation of the anti-trust law had been shown.

"The legality of the method of preparing, adopting, and filing the official classification has never before been questioned, nor, indeed, was it questioned in the complaints leading to your order of the 8th inst., which were that the changes made are 'discriminating and wrongful,' and will subject shippers and shipments in the territory affected 'to unreasonable charges and unjust discrimination and undue prejudice and disadvantage.'

"During the course of the testimony at the hearing it was repeatedly suggested that your commission had no power to take official action at that time, but that, after the classification had gone into effect, it would be open to shippers to make formal complaint invoking the remedy provided for unreasonable rates and unjust discriminations by the inter-State commerce law.

"During the course of the hearing the shippers who were present protesting against the changes, requested the carriers to postpone the time for the official classification to take effect for sixty or ninety days. This request was refused, the carriers insisting that the effect of the changes could only be determined by experience, and stating they would be quite willing to consider complaints and correct changes which practical operation should prove to be unjust. It was after this request for a postponement had been refused that some of the shippers presented to the commission the resolution and petition which you have transmitted.

"This resolution recites that the changes made by the new official classification, by increaseing less than carload rates over carload rates, will greatly inure to the benefit of the large shippers and to the detriment of the small shippers; and that a postponement of their operation has been refused, therefore the shippers petition the commission to lay the testimony before the Attorney General in order that he may take action under the anti-trust law to prevent the official classification from going into operation.

"It is apparent from the protests originally filed, from the terms of your order of the 8th inst., from the resolution and petition presented by the shippers and from your own communication, that it is the changes made, and not the method of making them, which is complained of. Under the classification which has obtained for many years, all freight is divided into six classes. For these classes the railroad companies fix graded rates. A change from a lower to a higher class would increase the rate if the existing rates are maintained.

"It is against the increased rate thus produced that the shippers protest. They claim:

"First—The changes will result in unreasonable rates;

"Second—In unjust discrimination against the small in favor of the large shippers;

"Third—In charging more for a short than a long haul.

"Obviously, these are matters for the consideration of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. A railroad company may raise its rates to an unreasonable point; it may discriminate among its shippers; it may charge more for a short than a long haul, but none of these acts, however unjust and wrongful, amounts to a violation of the anti-trust law.

"To authorize the Attorney General to direct injunction proceedings under this law it must be shown that there is a "contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States.' In the first place, there is no contract, combination, or conspiracy shown. There is consultation by representative railroad men in committee respecting suggested changes in classification. There is subsequent independent action by railroad companies in the adoption of the new classification recommended by the committee. The testimony taken does not show that any railroad company acted under compulsion of a combination in adopting the official classification.

"It must be conceded that a common classification by railroad companies operating in the same territory is a desirable thing. Will it be insisted that railroad companies cannot consult respecting freight classification? Or that, because one railroad company adopts a certain classification, another cannot? The anti-trust law says there must be a contract, or combination, or conspiracy. This must be shown. And it must be shown to restain individual action. This is not shown in the testimony submitted.

"Moreover, there must not only be a contract, combination, or conspiracy, but it must be in restraint of inter-State commerce. As applies to carriers, this means a combination to suppress competition. It is only by suppressing competition and arbitrarily fixing rates, that a restraint can be put upon inter-State commerce. The filing of an official classification does not fix the rates. It places articles in certain classes, but the rates for the classes are determined by the railroad companies outside the classification.

"The Trans-Missouri and Joint Traffic Association cases afford no precedent for the action requested in this case. Each of those associations was formed by a contract, under which the companies selected a central authority to fix and maintain rates. There was an absolute suppression of competition. The power of independent action was destroyed. No company could change a rate fixed by the managers of the association without subjecting itself to a penalty.

"If the testimony submitted showed a combination among the railroad companies to restrain commerce among the several States, I would not hesitate to invoke the remedy provided by the anti-trust law, but to take such action upon the faith of the facts submitted, would not only be futile, but absurd. If there be a remedy for the complaining shippers, it lies in an appeal to your commission under the Inter-State Commerce law."

SHIP STICKS ON THE WAYS.

WILMINGTON, Del., Dec. 30.—The attempt to launch the Winsor Line steamship Grecian at the Harlan & Hollingsworth Shipyards to-day, was a failure, the new ship sticking on the ways.

When the blocks were sawed away and the vessel started for her plunge into the icy water, Miss Winsor, daughter of the President of the company, who acted as sponsor for the new liner, broke the traditional bottle of wine and spoke the words that named the ship. To the great disappointment of everybody, however, the huge hulk moved only about eighteen inches and then stuck. An investigation showed that the tallow in the ways had frozen and caked, and when the vessel started to move the grease dropped from the ways and she rested on the timbers without the tallow.

Jacks were used in an attempt to start the ship again, but every effort failed, and after an hour's hard work it was decided to abandon the task. The vessel was then made fast, shored up, and will be blocked up and a new supply of tallow placed on the ways, when it is expected she will again be started on Tuesday for her launching.

The Grecian is a three-deck freight and passenger steamer, built to rate under the United States standard for seventeen years; length over all, 290 feet; beam, 42 feet, and a carrying capacity of about 2,500 tons. She has four water-tight bulkheads, four hatches, four side ports on each side, two steel masts, together with steel deck house, with accommodations for about a hundred passengers. She has two electric light plants, 200 lights each, and an eighteen-inch searchlight. The power will be furnished by triple-expansion engines, with four boilers, built to sustain a working pressure of 170 pounds. She will have a bunker capacity of 275 tons, and is to make a speed of 15¾ knots on her trial.

ALDERMEN'S LAST MEETING

KING'S BRIDGE GRANT PASSED

Appropriation of $1,000,000 for Blackwell's Island Bridge Goes Through, but the Council Refuses It.

The last meeting of the Board of Aldermen for the year 1899 took place yesterday. A new board will be organized Tuesday. According to an opinion of Corporation Counsel Whalen all business unfinished at yesterday's session must be introduced as new business next year. The opinion was a surprise to the Aldermen.

The principal business transacted by the outgoing board was the adoption of a resolution approving the construction of a new bridge across the East River from Pike Slip, Manhattan, to Brooklyn. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 45 to 10, but not until Alderman Stewart had questioned the count and Chief Clerk Blake had for the second time called the roll.

Before Clerk Blake had called the roll for the second time Alderman Byrne protested, claiming Alderman Stewart had no right to question the honesty of the Clerk. Clerk Blake got mad. He had acted as Clerk for nearly twelve years, and his word had never been questioned before.

The next business brought up was the resolution providing for the building of the proposed Blackwell's Island bridge. As soon as the resolution was announced there was much dodging of the members, several of the followers of Tammany leaving the room. Aldermen James J. Smith and Fleck were among those who disappeared. They were cornered in the anteroom, and, although they were coaxed to return and cast their ballot for or against the resolution, they refused. Finally Mr. Smith was carried in by several other members and he voted in the negative. Only 42 votes were recorded in favor of the resolution, and the Chairman, Alderman Muh, announced its defeat.

Alderman McCall surprised everybody a half hour later by calling up again the resolution authorizing the construction of the Blackwell's Island bridge, and in a short time the Aldermen had reconsidered their previous action in defeating the resolution and had secured the necessary forty-five votes to pass it. The Aldermen, having authorized the construction of the bridge, then appropriated $1,000,000 with which to begin work.

The Aldermen passed the King's Bridge Road franchise, the rate of compensation for which was fixed by the Board of Estimate a few weeks ago. This is the franchise which was granted to the Third Avenue Railroad Company three years ago, but the grant was set aside by the courts. The Third Avenue Road and the Metropolitan Company have since divided the territory and settled all differences.

The proposed railroad is to run up King's Bridge Road from Manhattan Street to One Hundred and Sixty-ninth Street, across the Harlem Ship Canal to Spuyten Duyvil and over Riverdale Avenue to the city line, with branches on the Boulevard, Lafayette, and West Two Hundred and Thirtieth Street.

The resolution providing for the payment of $305,000 for extra work on the Harlem Speedway, which has been held up by the Aldermen ever since the board has been in existence, was approved.

A resolution was adopted authorizing $475,000 for the purchase of new police station sites in different parts of the city.

The Aldermen concurred in a resolution changing the name of Mall Street to Van Cott Place.

Before taking up the business of the meeting, resolutions were adopted thanking President Woods, Vice President Gledhill, Chief Clerk Michael F. Blake, and Deputy McCoy, the clerks, and reporters for their services. Alderman Bridges introduced a resolution, which was adopted, extending to Col. John L. Burleigh, a retiring member, the best wishes of his fellow-members. All the retiring members were embraced in one resolution extending them the best wishes of those remaining behind. Alderman Woodward, the leader of the minority, was also thanked.

A committee of Councilmen announced at 1 o'clock that the hour of 12 o'clock was approaching, and that the Council was going to adjourn. A joint committee from the Council and Aldermen had agreed that the Municipal Assembly should adjourn at 12 o'clock, but to give them more time the clock was turned back. The remaining business was rapidly disposed of, and the board adjourned sine die.

MEETING OF THE COUNCIL.

Would Call Elm Street Dewey Avenue —New Name for Whitehall Street.

The Councilmen met in their chamber yesterday and approved the resolution adopted by the Aldermen providing for the erection of the East River Bridge from Pike Street to Brooklyn. The Council also approved the resolution passed previously by the Aldermen relating to the King's Bridge Road franchise.

A resolution offered originally as a "slap" at Controller Coler and providing for a tunnel to the Borough of Queens at a cost of $1,900,000 was laid over. The Council approves of the resolution authorizing the expenditure of $475,000 for new station houses, but the resolution providing for the issuance of $365,000 in bonds for the construction of the East River Park failed to pass for the want of the necessary number of votes.

The Council appropriated $200,000 for the construction of a bridge across the Newtown Creek, but refused to pass the resolution appropriating $1,000,000 for the Blackwell's Island Bridge. The resolution authorizing the construction of the bridge was passed by the Council some time ago.

It was decided to change the name of Elm Street to Dewey Avenue and Whitehall Street to South Broadway. It was also decided to change the name of Mall Street to Van Cott Place.

Complimentary speeches were made by President Guggenheimer, Vice President Oakley, and several other members.

COLER SCORES SCHOOL SYSTEM

Says His Department Is Not to Blame for Delay in Paying Manhattan and Bronx Teachers.

Controller Coler issued the following statement yesterday: "It appears there will probably be considerable delay in paying the school teachers of Manhattan and the Bronx the balance of the amounts due them for the year 1899. This is entirely due to the inability of the School Board to state how much of the amount claimed is due to the Ahearn law.

"The School Board has known, or should have known, during the last three months that under the law, and the resolution of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, the amounts payable from the proceeds of the sale of revenue bonds sold under the Ahearn act should be kept separate from the general school fund. And now that the end of the year has come, another effort will doubtless be made to show that the Department of Finance is responsible for this wholly unnecessary delay.

"This is only another instance of the astonishing business inefficiency of the whole school system. There seems to be no one responsible for these mistakes, and I do not think that these troubles will be at an end until a small number of well paid Commissioners be substituted for the present unwieldly body of gentlemen, who always take offense at the slightest criticism of their action and plead that they are working for the city for nothing.

"In regard to the present difficulty, the Auditor of the Board of Education claims that he cannot straighten out his pay roll for two months. If this is so, there must be something radically wrong with the Auditor's department. If the force of clerks there is insufficient I will be glad to send experts to assist.

"But the idea that this department could permit a special and trust fund, resulting from a sale of bonds under a special act of the Legislature, to be commingled with appropriation accounts of the budget will be recognized as absurd by every one having the slightest information about municipal finance.

"That the separation of these accounts would be necessary has been manifest for the past three months. The responsibility for the failure to comply with the resolution of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment is too clearly placed to be avoided by any one."

SURROGATE'S ANNUAL REPORT.

Total Number of Orders and Decrees Entered and Signed, 22,432.

The annual report of the work done in the Surrogates' office for the year 1899 was submitted yesterday. It showed that 4,462 special motions were heard and disposed of, 3,270 written decisions were handed down, 462 hearings in will contests took place, 1,938 wills were offered for probate, of which 1,835 were admitted and 11 rejected; 1,740 letters testamentary were granted, and 1,916 decrees on final accountings. The total number of orders and decrees entered and signed was 22,432, and 3,023 letters of administration were issued.

The quarterly returns of estates made to the Controller of the State of New York and to the Controller of the City of New York show that there were 1,835 testate estates and 3,023 intestate estates, and that the amount of taxes certified to the Controller as assessed and fixed was $984,525, and the amount of property reported taxable $3,118,706.

MAYOR QUINCY QUITS OFFICE.

Boston's Executive, on Retiring, Reviews Municipal Tendencies.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—The final session of the Board of Aldermen of 1899 was held to-day, and the occasion became notable from the fact that Mayor Quincy sent to the board a valedictory message of remarkable length.

The communication from the Mayor gave a review of some of the improvements in municipal government which have been introduced during Mayor Quincy's term of four years, and which, the Executive says, have placed Boston far ahead of the other cities in the United States in administrative organization. The message also said that in the future the logical course will be to further restrict the powers of the City Government rather than to restore to it any of the functions which have been removed by the allotment of various work to departments created for the purpose.

The message said in part:

"Under our political conditions, no system of administration could be less stable than one which depended upon committees whose members were annually elected; on the other hand, the record will show that there has been greater stability since administrative control has been centred in the hands of the Mayor. The lengthening of the Mayor's term to two years, with the increase in the number of unpaid boards, has greatly strengthened this tendency.

"The logical course of our future municipal development should be not to restore any of the powers which have been taken from the City Council, but to further restrict its powers, so far as it appears that these are used not for the protection of the public treasury or of the general interests of the citizens, but as a means of harassing an administration, extorting petty favors which ought not to be granted, or securing employing for constituents which cannot now be given, except in rare cases, without violation or evasion of the civil service laws. I believe that the existing organization of the executive work of the city as outlined is nearly as perfect as can be devised at the present time."

Boston's Postmaster in Office To-day.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—Late this afternoon word was received at the Federal Building from Washington ordering that the Post Office effects be turned over to the new Postmaster, George A. Hibbard, at once. This will take place at 9 o'clock, A. M. to-morrow. Mr. Henderson, now Acting Postmaster, will be given a receipt for all property turned over to him, and the new regime at the Federal Building will be begun.

Refuses to Extradite John K. Parker.

ALBANY, Dec. 30.—Gov. Roosevelt, after a hearing to-day, refused to issue extradition papers for the return to the State of New Jersey of John K. Parker, who kept a large billiard room at the West End Hotel, Asbury Park, N. J. Parker, in 1895, was convicted of selling whisky to three men, and was sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

COTTON MILLS PROSPEROUS.

FALL RIVER, Mass., Dec. 30.—Consolidation has been the order of the day so far as the industrial interests of this city are concerned during the last twelve months. The greatest combination of all, the Selling Committee of the Fall River Cotton Manufacturers' Association, controls practically all of the cotton cloth mills in this city. Its powers have been added to during the last year, until now it is the selling agent for every mill in the association.

The Kerr Thread Company, employing 600 hands, has been absorbed by the American Thread Company, and a mammoth new mill will be built by that trust here in the Spring with a capacity of 100,000 spindles and giving employment to about 1,000 hands.

The spool and bobbin mill, a paying concern here, has been absorbed by the spool and bobbin combine. The Union Belt Company, which has been paying large dividends, has come under control of the Belt Trust, and the Globe Yarn and Sanford Spinning Mills have been purchased by the New England Yarn Company. The Fall River Bleachery, with a surplus fund as large as its original capital stock, is now a member of a bleaching trust, and the management of the Parker and the three Hargraves mills has been consolidated. The Eddy Woolen Mill has been bought by the American Woolen Trust and dismantled, thus removing the last vestige of that industry from this city.

The business for the year has been enormous, and the dividends given to stockholders have averaged 6 per cent. The new dividend year promises even better than the old, the outlook being for an annual dividend of 8 per cent.

Recruits' Requirements Modified.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Secretary of War has modified the requirements as to physical proportions of candidates for enlistment in the army. In an order just issued he says: "It is not necessary that the applicant should conform exactly to the figures indicated in Paragraph 179. A variation not exceeding ten pounds in weight or two inches in chest measurement at expiration below the standard given in the table is admissible when the applicant for enlistment is active, has firm muscles, and is evidently vigorous and healthy."

Columbian Iron Works Gets Extension.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Naval Construction Board to-day decided to allow eleven months' additional time to the Columbian Iron Works in which to complete the construction of the submarine boat Plunger and the torpedo boat Tingey.

Movements of Naval Vessels.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—Admiral Farquhar on his flagship New York arrived at St. Thomas yesterday. He expects to be joined in his cruise among the West Indies by the Texas, which will start from New York for the south as soon as she has completed some repairs.

The battleship Massachusetts has arrived at New York, and it is understood she will soon go out of commission in order to furnish a crew for one of the new battleships, the Kentucky or Kearsarge.

The Navy Department has reconsidered its decision to put the collier Marcellus out of commission.

The formal transfer of the converted yacht Viking from the navy to the army has taken place at Norfolk. The army wants the boat for service in Cuba and Puerto Rico, and pays the navy the sum which the Viking cost when she was purchased at the beginning of the Spanish war.

Railroad Auditor Commits Suicide.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Dec. 30.—Auditor Uriah B. Rogers of the Chicago and West Michigan, and Detroit, Grand Rapids and Western Railroads committed suicide this noon by shooting himself through the head while sitting at his desk in his private office. Death was instantaneous. Despondency over a long illness and a severe nervous strain are the probable causes of the deed.

FUNERAL OF GEN. LAWTON

Impressive Services Were Held Yesterday at Manila.

BODY IS HOMEWARD BOUND

Native Delegations Present Wreaths and the Women Condole with Mrs. Lawton.

MANILA, Dec. 30.—The funeral of Gen. Henry W. Lawton, who was killed at San Mateo, Dec. 18, was held this morning with impressive ceremonies. The remains were conveyed from the Paco Cemetery down to the Luneta, to Pasig, and thence to the transport Thomas, which sails this afternoon.

As the body was removed from the vault Chaplain Marrin read the prayers. The personal staff of the late General was augmented by Color Sergeant Simon, Trumpeter Haberkam, and Privates Okum and Mohrhasen. The latter, who were closely connected with Gen. Lawton's recent campaigns, bore the casket from the vault to a six-horsed caisson waiting at the gate.

The funeral procession was composed of the band of the Twentieth Regiment, Gen. Hall and his staff, two troops of the Fourth Cavalry, who were with Gen. Lawton at the time of his death; a battery of artillery, a number of clergymen, the caisson, covered with flowers; the personal staff of the General, on foot; Gens. Wheeler, Watson, Bates, Forsythe, Kobbe, and Schwan, and Rear Admiral Watson, in three carriages; a naval battalion, Major Gen. Otis and his staff, the foreign Consuls, in full dress, and the members of the Philippine Supreme Court. Native delegations from the towns where Gen. Lawton established civil governments presented wreaths. Women from the same towns waited on Mrs. Lawton yesterday and presented her with their condolences and flowers.

Crowds of natives and Americans witnessed the procession, the band played dirges, and the crowds uncovered.

At Pasig the casket was transferred to a tug, taps was sounded, and prayers were offered by Chaplain Pierce.

Four enlisted pall bearers will accompany the remains to the United States.

LAWTON FUND STILL GROWS.

Gen. Corbin Now Has $32,774.25, and $4,727.94 Has Been Raised Here.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Lawton home fund continues to grow, the daily increase for the last few days ranging between $2,000 and $4,000. Gen. Corbin's statement to-day shows that the subscriptions received by him up to date amount to $32,774.25.

The Bankers' Trust Company's subscription list for the Lawton fund, which is to remain open till Jan. 5, was swelled yesterday to a total of $4,727.94, by $142.50 in new gifts, as follows: "W. H. B.," $10; L. G. Klatz, M. D., $2; "Bank Clerk," 50 cents; Cyrus Field Judson, $100; S. H. Brown, $5, and Breese & Smith, $25.

FUNSTON PASSES THE LIE.

Says Man Who Asserted He Swam No Rivers Spoke Falsely.

MINNEAPOLIS, Dec. 30.—I. Seymour of St. Paul, a veteran of the civil war and a friend of Brig. Gen. Funston, saw a published statement which tended to cast discredit upon the latter's swimming exploit in the Philippines. Mr. Seymour cut out the clipping and forwarded the same with a letter to Gen Funston. In reply Mr. Seymour is in receipt of a letter from the General, who writes from the transport Indiana at sea, Nov. 3, as follows:

"The officer of whom you spoke is undoubtedly one of those small-souled creatures who, never having the courage to do anything themselves, take a sort of puppish delight in depreciating the laurels won by other men. His statement that he heard me say that I never swam a river in the Philippines, and that in fact I could not swim, is a lie out of whole cloth.

"Will you do me the favor to tell him that I said so, and show this to whatever persons were with you when he made the remark?

"I swam the Bagbag River with one other officer and four men of the Twentieth Kansas under a hot fire, April 20. The Rio Grande River I crossed two days later on a raft, and, with forty-five men, after a desperate fight, drove 2,500 of the enemy from an entrenched position.

"It was for this latter feat that I was made a Brigadier General."

SECOND VICTORY FOR LOCKETT

Again Defeats the Insurgents Near Montalban.--Enemy's Loss Heavy. American Loss Six.

MANILA, Dec. 31.—Col. Lockett has had a second engagement with the insurgents northwest of Montalban, and, by a brilliant charge, drove the enemy from their position.

Only one American officer and five soldiers were wounded, but the loss of the insurgents was heavy.

Our troops captured a number of rifles and a quantity of ammunition and provisions.

COLD-STORAGE PLANT AT MANILA.

Government to Have a Building Which Will Cost $500,000.

Twenty-five hundred tons of material designed for the Government's new Commissary's stores in Manila were shipped from New York by the Quartermaster's Department last week, and some 1,200 tons more will go forward this week. The building for which this material is intended is a cold storage plant, which, it is said, will be the largest of its kind in the world.

It is to be 245 feet square, two stories high, and surmounted by a tower. Its prospective appearance has been likened to the Madison Square Garden. It will be of the same color brick, and the bricks are to be made in the Philippines by Filipino workmen, though under the direction of American craftsmen, and with an American plant. It will hold 1,200 tons of beef, 200 tons of mutton, 50 tons of butter, 100 tons of potatoes and onions, 100 tons of bacon, besides eggs, pork, and other perishable food sufficient to feed 10,000 soldiers for three months.

The ice-making plant will have a capacity of forty tons a day. Electric machinery covering a great variety of appliances for handling freight will reduce the human factor in such labor to a minimum. The grounds about the building are to be laid out attractively, a fountain being one of the features, and the building itself will lay claim to some artistic beauty.

The tower, which is, in fact, a chimney, will be made conspicuously decorative, surmounted as it will be by a huge glass globe, to be illuminated at night, and above this there will be a figure of Liberty. The building complete will cost $500,000.

Movements of Transports.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 30.—The transports Tartar and Valencia probably will be sent back to Manila with freight. There are now about 4,000 tons of freight waiting on the Government dock, and no steamers to take it. The Sheridan is already engaged to sail from here on Jan. 4, for Seattle, to take forage from there to Manila.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Quartermaster General has been informed that the transport Kilpatrick left Cienfuegos yesterday on her way to Manzanillo, and that the Sedgwick sailed from the same point for Havana.

Death of Soldiers in Cuba.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—Gen. Wood, at Havana, has informed the War Department of the following deaths among the troops in Cuba: Lawrence J. Clay, band, Second Cavalry, inflammation of liver, Dec. 28, at Santa Clara; John Butz, G, Second Cavalry, yellow fever, Matanzas, Dec. 27; Lee R. Mansfield, L, Second Cavalry, appendicitis, Placetas, Dec. 28.

Will Sell an Auxiliary Cruiser.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Navy Department has decided to sell the auxiliary cruiser Resolute. The department bought her at a cost of $480,000.

It was said at the hospital that while there is little change in his condition, the critical period following the operation has passed and there is hope of his recovery unless unlooked for complications set in.

EGYPTIAN WOMAN'S ROMANCE.

Travels Far to Learn of Chess and Chattle Mortgages and Secure a Husband.

Miss Adele Tischler's ignorance of the game of chess, which resulted first in the arrest of her friend, Samuel Briskman, and then in her own arrest, was the indirect cause of her marriage to Briskman, which event was celebrated yesterday at her home, at 705 Eighth Avenue.

Mrs. Briskman is a young Egyptian woman, who came to this country about five months ago to visit relatives. She is pretty and a linguist. She had, when she arrived in this city, a considerable sum of money which she was very anxious to invest. She opened negotiations with several business agents, and in a few weeks found herself the proprietor and editor of The American Chess Magazine, with offices at 132 West Twenty-third Street. For this property she paid over $1,000, she says, and gave a chattel mortgage of $500 on the plant and fixtures to W. E. Kruger & Co., the owners of the magazine. She concluded that a knowledge of the game of chess would help her in her editorial duties, and one evening last week asked Briskman how she could learn to play it. Briskman offered to teach her. She had no idea of the meaning of a chattel mortgage, and gave Briskman the key to her office, asking him to bring her a couple of chessboards with the pieces.

Kruger was passing the offices of the Chess Magazine at the time Briskman was procuring the men and caught him just in the act of leaving the building with a chessboard under each arm. Thinking that he had surprised a thief, he grabbed Briskman by the throat and shouted for a policeman. Briskman objected forcibly to this treatment, and by the time a policeman arrived both men were in a heap on the pavement with the chessmen and fragments of the broken boards scattered around them.

Briskman spent the night in a police station, and was arraigned in Jefferson Market Court next morning on a charge of having stolen property covered by Kruger's mortgage. His friend came to his rescue, however, and said that he was not to blame, as she had sent him for the chessboards herself. She said that she thought she had a perfect right to the property, which she had paid for.

Kruger then made a charge of larceny against the woman, and preferred charges of assault against Briskman.

Magistrate Pool held both prisoners in $1,000 bail for trial last Wednesday, but on motion of their lawyers the hearing was adjourned until next Wednesday.

The reason given for the adjournment was that the couple had decided to get married.

Briskman says that when his present wife came forward in the police court to plead for him he was completely captivated by her courage and eloquence, and Mrs. Briskman says that the devotion shown by her husband in his vain attempt to bring her the chessboards won for him a place in her affections. At first the couple were anxious to have Magistrate Pool perform the marriage ceremony, but when they learned that he was opposed to such proceedings in court they decided on having the celebration at the home of the bride

WILLIAM DUCKGEISCHEL'S WILL.

Agreement of the Heirs and the Referee's Recent Decision.

The Supreme Court having affirmed the report of the referee in the partition suit in the case of the will of William Duckgeischel, Justice Giegerich on Friday, as has been stated, granted the final judgment for the division of the estate.

Mrs. Frances Belz, a daughter of William Duckgeischel, had brought an action against her brother and sisters. Margaretha Duckgeischel, a defendant, testified at the trial of the action that her father left a will by which his estate was given to her mother during life, and upon her death to be divided equally between Margaretha Duckgeischel, Mary Vetter, and Anastasias Duckgeischel and bequeathing $5 to Frances Belz, and that she destroyed this will by burning it after her mother's death, with some old papers. The content of the will, as stated, was substantially testified to by Margaretha Duckgeischel, Mary Vetter, John Vetter, and a friend who read the will. After testimony was in, negotiations for settlement were begun. A stipulation was finally signed by all the parties which related both to the mother's estate and to the partition suit and under which Frances Belz, the plaintiff, agreed to pay Margaretha Duckgeischel $2,000. It was also agreed in writing "that hereafter the reference in the partition suit before George E. Mott, as referee, be conducted in a friendly spirit so as to accomplish the object of this stipulation." The referee then found that the will had not been proved.

BRITAIN AND THE BOERS

THE BOERS AND THE BRITISH.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

You take me to task for that part of my letter upon the Boer question where I say that both England and America are predatory nations. "She is pledged to leave Egypt. Well, we are pledged to leave Cuba. We will both withdraw at about the same time." You "deduce" from this that I imply that we shall both follow "the good old plan." But by that very deduction are you not giving away your case and admitting that England never means to withdraw and that she is a predatory nation? Why not come to the truth at once? If there is a future event sure of fulfillment it is that England will never of her own accord leave Egypt, and consequently never keep the pledge France thinks she has made and about which the French are making such a useless pother.

Further, let me add the queer confession that the history of England certainly proves the individual Englishman to be the most honest and honorable of men as well as the most liberty loving and public spirited, (excepting always the Dutch, of course.) The defenders of the Boer war continually throw up to us the tu quoque. To say nothing of our trivial differences with Spain, (about which "the less said the soonest mended,") they bring with dire force the case of Texas, which is, as we lawyers say, on all fours—identical—with that of the Transvaal. Our Americans went to Texas mostly to make money. They were possibly no better than the Uitlanders on the average. In a short time they started a rebellion, and the Mexicans treated them worse than Oom Paul did the Jameson raiders. So their wrongs stirred the great and tender American heart, and we gave the Mexicans an awful drubbing and took about half of their country to indemnify us for the trouble and suffering they had caused. Do not misunderstand me. Personally—that is, as far as my personal opinion and feeling have any value—I was and am thoroughly in favor of that war.

Compare Texas and California as they are with what they would have been. And yet America's course there was as wrong from a Christian, moral point of view, as the attack on the Boers. Now, since you have called me to account, I am going to retaliate. Not quite assuming to do likewise, but to ask you for an explanation. You denounced Oom Paul, calling him "an uncommonly adroit and sordid old reprobate" and sundry other disreputable things.

What is your authority for these statements? Would you have made them on the mere assertion of Uitlanders, who are rather prejudiced, as witnesses? Oom Paul is hated by a portion, and a portion only, of the Uitlanders, but he is beloved of the Boers from Cape Town to Pretoria. His word is law, and he is obeyed as if he were King instead of President. And if he were the dishonest creature you assert, it would be the money of the South African Republic, not of the Uitlanders, which he would have converted, and the corrupt Uitlanders could make easier bargains with him for public favors and would have less fault to find with him. But I simply ask you for the grounds and proof of your assertions. "Give a dog a bad name and kill him." That has been the course all along of the enemies of the Transvaal.

The very word "Boer" unfortunately lent itself to this, as it undoubtedly is the origin of our word "boor." We Americans refer proudly to the "embattled farmers" of Lexington, fighting for their liberties against tyrannical England, to have called them "embattled boors" would be ludicrous. And yet "Boer" means exactly the same. Next it was a favorite charge to call them cowardly. We need not discuss that just now lest we reflect on the courage of the soldiers they so utterly defeated.

Then they were cruel and would ill-treat prisoners and wounded. The "pig-sticking" of those who had so surrendered has so far been confined to the English, and every kindness and gentleness has been shown by the Boers. Next we heard they were dirty—it being implied that all dirty people may be robbed by the more cleanly. Well, Holland is famous as a dirty nation. Is she not? And her children the world over retain her characteristics. And now you say Oom Paul is a rascal. Will you kindly disgorge your proof?

ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT.

SYMPATHY FOR THE BOERS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I avail myself of your generous offer respecting the Boer Government and Mr. T. G. Shearman's letter of Dec. 21st. England's frequent appeals, by various devices to gain American sympathy in her efforts to crush the republic of the Boers, are as unbecoming as her slobbering conduct to impress the people of the United tSates of her love for us.

The bulk of our people believe that every privilege was accorded the English in the Transvaal that should be accorded to aliens in the United States. We ordinary readers are apt to infer that Mr. Shearman is giving his own views on the subject, which appeared in your issue of Dec. 21st, were it not for his introductory remarks, in which he says, "Those who desire to find chapter and verse as authority for these statements can do so by reading two books," citing clauses one to twenty-six, the bulk of which is a tirade of abuse against the Boers and their Government unworthy of consideration. Nor can I accept them as Mr. Shearman's, although he presents them; but whether in the capacity of a paid counsel signing his name for the good it may do in causing a large sale of the books mentioned, or as a press agent of the English Government.

In either capacity, I am not prepared to say that Mr. Shearman is violating any rule of the legal fraternity, providing he receives a fee for his services. In Clause 1 we are informed "that in 1884 Mr. Krüger visited London, and he was so poor he could not pay his hotel bill, and it was paid for him by a generous Englishman." Mr. Shearman will find a parallel to this in the case of our own President McKinley, whose obligations were met by a generous American, nor was McKinley's misfortune permitted to leave a stain, such as is implied by Mr. Shearman in the case of Mr. Krüger.

Second, "Mr. Krüger afterward sold one of his farms to Englishmen for $500,000." Mr. Shearman does not say how long afterward, although he impresses upon our minds the fact that Krüger was poor in 1884, "and could not pay for his meals." Would Mr. Shearman have your readers infer that Krüger stole the land, or that he was money poor in 1884, as our own President was in 1898?

Third—We are informed that "these foreigners produce every dollar's worth of wealth which can be exported from the Transvaal, and every dollar in excess of what will suffice for a very bare and dirty existence." This third clause is England's claim; it is that alone on which she justifies her war against the Republic of the Boers, because her commercial enterprise (with the Boers' permission) has proved profitable to a country and a people whose independence she has previously recognized and whom she now seeks to annihilate, because from motives of greed she has been instrumental to their success.

England's claims for supremacy in South Africa are no stronger than England's claims for supremacy in the United States, and which, in a diplomatic way, she is striving to assert. Will Mr. Shearman deny that the same conditions do not exist—that England's capital has not constructed our railroads, developed our mines, and operated our industries, a large portion of which she owns and operates to-day, and a large portion of whose untaxed earnings finds its way into the pockets of an alien nobility?

The same is true of our public lands because of the laxity of our Government in not adhering to our Constitution. England's Lord Chief Justice, with Mr. Chamberlain as a coadjutor, in an address in Washington two years ago, in advising the enactment of certain laws, said as a reminder that "when Parliament passes a law it is a law, regardless of the Constitution." God forbid that we should betray our trust, or that the day should ever dawn when the American citizen's heart will fail to go out in sympathy toward a people who strive for liberty and the right of self-government.

New York, Dec. 25, 1899. C. C.

THE COST TO ENGLAND.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Permit a very old reader of your esteemed journal to put in a word of protest against your editorial in to-day's issue entitled "Size and Sympathy." Any number of previous articles in THE TIMES have made it very clear to your readers that your sympathies are strongly enlisted on the side of England in the struggle between Boers and English. But even the ardor of your admiration for England and the type of civilization she stands for, the justice of which I cheerfully concede, does not justify such strong condemnation of those who belong to the "mob" which believes that in this war England is entirely in the wrong and the Transvaal entirely right.

It happens that all the journals I habitually read, and there are two others beside your own, although your paper is the one I have at home for the family, side as strongly with the English as you do, but your readers can form their own opinions from your news columns, as good or perhaps better than take them ready made from the editor's pen. When we read that the mass of people in all countries in Europe, a large number if not a majority of citizens in this country, as shown by mass meetings, collections, &c.; a great number of foreigners in the Transvaal, as shown by joining the Boers in the fight, the numbers of Dutch Afrikanders in the Cape Colony proper, the whole of the Orange Free State, who all have joined hands and fortunes with that unscrupulous and detestable Uncle Paul, think and act and dare different from what is thought proper in the editorial sanctum, we of the common mob and herd find courage to disagree with such abusive editorials as "Size and Sympathy."

It is not only dislike of England and her foreign policy, or jealousy because she is a great power, but a genuine love and admiration for a people who are willing to fight and die for their freedom and liberty and right to live according to their own ideals, which produce that strong current of feeling in favor of the Boers which exists in spite of all newspaper showing.

It is ridiculous to speak of English rule being all for liberty, order, justice, and right, when after having possession of the Cape of Good Hope over 100 years the descendants of the original Dutch are willing to take up arms against their rulers. What kind of government must that be which keeps alive those feelings in the hearts of its subjects after four generations of rule? Another point, Mr. Editor, you forget, but which the "mob" remembers, is that this war is one between "our own people." This is no fight between Teuton and Celt, or Latin and Teuton, or Slav and Teuton, or black and white, or brown and yellow and white, but right in our own family, where the stronger brother by force of mailed hand robs the smaller brother. This war is pretty near to civil war, gotten up by speculators and with the most sordid motives actuating the most commercially interested people on the globe. The common people, if I may gauge the feelings aright which actuate those I conversed with on the subject, seem to incline to the belief that England can well stand a slap in the face when there is no money in the fight, but will put forth a great deal of effort against a weaker nation to make business better and grab land, goldfields, or any other commodity its Stock Exchanges and joint stock companies see a chance to make a dividend out of.

Even the English speakers have dropped all talk of the wrongs of the poor Outlanders, and slowly the force of public opinion is driving them to acknowledge that what they want they should have because they are strong enough to take it.

There is for the common "mob" one great satisfaction in the struggle, no matter how it ends—the costs have already been too big to make the speculation pay. There is, in fact, a strong possibility that England, like Spain during the fifteenth century, may find the beginning of the end of her greatness in fighting the Dutch.

CHRISTIANITY OF BOERS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

So much has been written about the piety of the Boers, they are so frequently compared with the early Puritans, that the opinion of the great African explorer and missionary, Dr. Livingstone, is of particular interest at this time. After speaking of the cruel treatment of the native tribes by the Boers Dr. Livingstone tells of the cold-blooded and cowardly way in which these Dutch "Pilgrim fathers" procured their domestic servants. "One or two friendly tribes are forced to accompany a party of mounted Boers. When they reach the tribe to be attacked the friendly natives are ranged in front to form a shield. Then the Boers coolly fire over their heads, the devoted people flee, and leave cattle, wives, and children to the captors. This was done in nine cases during my residence in the interior, and on no occasion was a drop of Boers' blood shed. And yet these Boers proudly boast themselves Christian." They have an immense contempt for the ignorance of the natives, and told Dr. Livingstone that he might as well teach baboons as Africans. They, however, declined a test which the missionary proposed, viz., to be examined whether they or his native attendants could read best. In his opinion they are quite as degraded as the blacks whom they despise.

It appears, therefore, that from the very establishment of the South African Republic to the present day the chief characteristics of the Boers have been ignorance, hypocrisy, and gross cruelty. They are capable of the most cunning and treacherous deeds, and yet pose before the world as a humble, God-fearing people. In the present war with England they have raised a flag of truce, and then deliberately slaughtered the opposing forces who have advanced to meet them. Yet these are the people we are asked to help and encourage in their present struggle. These are the people that some writers love to compare with the founders of this great Republic! It would seem to be the duty of every true American to resent such comparison.

Whatever may be the cause of the war between the English and the Boers is no concern of the United States. In our recent war with Spain England did not make inquiries as to the causes of the conflict. She looked further ahead. She saw what complications might arise with more powerful countries than Spain, and she gave us her hearty support. And she rendered us a very great service. In her present distress, when so many nations are rejoicing at her discomfiture, and hoping for greater disaster to her arms, England should receive the sympathy and great moral support of the people of the United States.

GUSTAVUS S. WALLACE.

ENGLISH VS. BOERS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I cannot believe that the number of writers for THE TIMES upon the Boer war pro and con furnishes a just ground for estimating the public sentiment. From the tone of the letters advocating the Boer side I judge that the writers are worked up to a much higher heat than are those on the other side. Evidently those entertaining their views are much more inclined to write than are others.

In view of what the English did for us in our late war, and in view of the great disparity between the two forms of civilization represented by the contestants, to say nothing about a natural kinship between the two great English-speaking nations, it is a mystery to me how any true American or true lover of humanity can do otherwise than sympathize with the English in this struggle. Many have tried to find a likeness between the Boers and our Revolutionary fathers. The likeness consists simply in the name republic. The latter protested against taxation without representation and fought to maintain their protest. The Boers are fighting for an oligarchy—really to maintain taxation without representation. Should the English be unsuccessful in this war, which I cannot for a moment believe, the clock of the world would be turned back many generations. It seems to me that every humane instinct within us would lead us to heartily sympathize with the English, if nothing more. B. W. B.

WANT TO GOVERN THEMSELVES.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have been much amused in reading the communication of your "Foreign Correspondent" on the third page of to-day's paper on the subject of the "Dutch in British Guiana." Your correspondent is manifestly "hoist with his own petard," as the "excerpt from the Colonial Constitution regarding the franchise" which he gives establishes the statement of Mr. Hillegas in "Oom Paul's People," which your correspondent characterizes as "insulting" and "misleading."

The third article given in the excerpt provides as a condition to being registered as a voter that he shall be "a British subject by birth or naturalization." Mr. Hillegas is therefore entirely correct in his statement that the British citizens control the franchise, while the Dutch are left voiceless and voteless in legislation. A condition from which they have vainly sought relief from the British Government, which is making war upon the Boers because the Boers are insisting that their land shall be governed by themselves and naturalized citizens and not by British subjects temporarily resident in the country.

BREAKS UNION SQUARE WINDOW.

Dola an Anarchist, Say the Police—Shelley His Teacher.

John Dola was a prisoner in the West Thirtieth Street Police Station last night. He had thrown a brick through one of the plate-glass windows of Mrs. Lynch's jewelry store in Union Square.

When Dola threw the brick he was standing near Policeman Madden. He gave himself up at once. At the station house he gave his name, but refused to give his address, saying he lived "in this world." When asked why he had broken the window Dola said:

"She has no right to be rich. There are too many poor people in this city."

Dola had in his possession a volume of Shelley's poems, a small dictionary, and two volumes of Tolstoi's works. In Shelley's poem "Queen Mab," the words "There is no God" had been marked. In another part of the book the following lines had been marked:

"No atom of the turbulence fulfills
A vague and unnecessitated task,
Or acts; but act it must and ought to act."

The police allege that the man is an Anarchist. He is well dressed and about thirty-five years old.

STATE AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Justice Gaynor Never Heard It Passed to the Defense.

Justice Gaynor, in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, yesterday, was asked to pass upon a new theory of self-defense in the case of Theodore Shanley, convicted in Richmond Borough of assault in the first degree. Application was made to Justice Gaynor for a certificate of reasonable doubt in the case.

The charge against Shanley was that he shot out an eye of a man with whom he quarreled. His counsel raised the point that the Judge in the Richmond County Court charged the jury that when the defendant set up self-defense as the reason and excuse for the shooting, the burden of proof rested upon him instead of on the prosecution.

Counsel declared he believed this theory of the law was wrong, and that the defendant was entitled to a certificate of reasonable doubt pending appeal.

Counsel for the District Attorney said he was convinced that it had been held in several leading cases that when self-defense was set up by a defendant, the burden of proof rested upon him.

Justice Gaynor said he had never heard of any such thing; that even in a case where the defense is an alibi, he always understood that the burden of proof never shifted from the prosecution. Justice Gaynor said, however, that he would look at the brief in the matter.

Queens Supervisors to Continue.

The Board of Supervisors of Queens County met in Long Island City yesterday, and after auditing the accounts of the county held a conference regarding the question as to whether their term of office expires to-day or not. Congressman Townsend Scudder, counsel of the board, advised the members to continue in office. He said there was nothing in the charter or amendments adopted at the last election legislating the Supervisors out of office.

Burning Icehouses Light Up the Sky.

Several large frame buildings, formerly used as icehouses by the Central Railroad of New Jersey, on Johnson Avenue, near Washington Street, Jersey City, caught fire at 8 o'clock last night and were destroyed. The flames illuminated the sky for miles. The buildings were abandoned some time ago and were empty. It is supposed the flames were caused by a spark from a locomotive. The loss is about $2,000.

Detective Adam Lang Dead.

Detective Adam Lang of the East Sixty-seventh Street Station died last night in the Presbyterian Hospital from a complication of diseases. He had been sick for ten days. He leaves a wife and six children. He was born in 1858, appointed to the force Oct. 23, 1886, and has served as a detective the greater part of the time. His most famous arrest was that of "Franchy," the murderer of "Shakespeare."

THREE LUCKY IMMIGRANTS.

Must Go Back, but Each Is Richer by $25 Through Anxiety of a Lawyer and Padrone to Land Them.

A lawyer new to the immigrant smuggling trade, and a Syrian, probably a padrone, overreached their mark yesterday in the Barge Office and were $75 the poorer by their experience.

The great majority of Syrian immigrants become peddlers, it was explained in the Barge Office, and many of them, on their arrival, are visited by agents, who give them checks or drafts, which they show to the immigration authorities to show that they have enough money to start in business, or at least to prevent them from becoming public charges for some time. Similar tricks are practiced by agents of Italian and Greek padrones, and when the immigrants are well out of the Barge Office they return the money to the padrones, who farm them out until they get enough money out of them to pay them for their trouble.

At the same time the Commissioner of Immigration often receives money and checks from people all over the country to hand over to their immigrating relatives on their arrival here.

A lawyer called yesterday at the Barge Office, accompanied by a Syrian from Washington Street, who said that he represented the cousin of several immigrants that had arrived by the steamer Germanic, and wanted to assist them in landing on these shores. The Syrian saw three of his countrymen standing by themselves in the pen and immediately recognized them as the cousins of his employer. He fell on their necks and embraced them in succession, and they responded to his salutations.

"Those very good man," he said to the lawyer. "You give them the shecks." The lawyer, however, went to Deputy Commissioner McSweeney and asked him whether the relatives of a Syrian in this city would be allowed to land if any money was given to them. Mr. McSweeney replied that he could not make any conditions. All immigrants had to undergo examination, and the fact of money being given to them would not make any difference as to their fitness or unfitness to be admitted.

The lawyer and the Syrian, who accompanied him, however, took their chances and gave the three new-found cousins a twenty-five-dollar check each. The faces of the latter brightened into broad grins as they showered blessings upon their benefactors' heads.

A little later the new-comers were examined, and it was decided to deport them. They shook the checks in the face of Commissioner Fitchie while exclaiming: "This good passport." Mr. Fitchie, through an interpreter, told them that the checks represented money which they could get from one of the money brokers in the Barge Office. This suggestion the immigrants acted upon without delay, and after pocketing the money remarked that this was a wonderful country.

"There are not any better people in the world than the Americans," the leader said. "When they refuse to admit a man to their country they are polite enough to pay him for the trouble of coming over."

Social Reform Union Meets.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—A three days' conference of the Social Reform Union and National Christian Citizenship League began here to-day with delegates of both sexes present from a dozen States. The objects of the organizations as set forth in the programme are "to unite the reform forces of the United States in a federated body, in which individuals and organizations, while retaining separate existence and freedom in pursuing separate lines of work, may unite for those practical immediate measures upon which they agree."

ADVANCE IN PORCELAIN WARE.

Manufacturers Reach an Agreement as to the Selling Price.

EAST LIVERPOOL, Ohio, Dec. 30.—Eastern and Western general ware and porcelain manufacturers reached an agreement on the selling price for 1900 at a meeting of the Trenton and East Liverpool districts here to-day. The result is a uniform scale for the entire country, averaging 5 per cent. advance. The manufacturers issue a statement in which they say:

"The lack of a uniform selling scale has resulted in some confusion the past year. The revision was not so much to advance prices as to settle on an equitable basis for the different classes of ware, maintaining a proper differential between the grades, from granite to porcelain."

CHARLES W. SLATER IN COURT.

Charles W. Slater of Slaterville, Va., who gave the Holland House as his address, was held for examination yesterday in the Jefferson Market Court in connection with a transaction involving two sight drafts for $1,100. The drafts were drawn by the defendant upon Robert Y. Slater of Washington, D. C., who, the defendant claims, is his brother. They were cashed by H. H. Young, private bookkeeper of the Murray Hill Hotel.

Mr. Slater claims he deposited $2,000 worth of bonds with Mr. Young as security, but the latter says the bonds have no value so far as he knows. Ex-Senator Call of Florida, who was in court, expressed his willingness to go on Slater's bond.

INDIAN FAMINE CONDITIONS.

Missionary Correspondent Says They Are Worse than Two Years Ago.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has received from the Rev. Dr. R. A. Hume, at Ahmednuggur, India, a letter, dated Dec. 2, in which he says that the present famine in Western India is sure to be far more distressing than the famine of two years ago, as severe drought already has begun in the Ahmednuggur district, and no rain can be expected until the middle of June. The writer says that Ahmednuggur has suffered also very badly from the plague, and is not yet free from it. Sholapur is now in a severe epidemic and Bombay is, perhaps, in the beginning of another plague experience.

In view of it all, says the correspondent, the Government, as always, is acting most nobly, but official relief never can meet the multitude of necessities.

GOVERNOR PARDONS MURDERER.

J. A. Baldwin Free To-morrow After Twenty Years in Sing Sing.

ALBANY, Dec. 30.—Gov. Roosevelt has granted a pardon to J. A. Baldwin, who has spent twenty years in Sing Sing Prison, and he will be released on New Year's Day. Baldwin was convicted of murder, first degree, for killing a fellow-workman in the cement works at Newburg. He was sentenced to be hanged, but on appeal by the jury was commuted to life imprisonment.

Several attempts to get a pardon failed until a Presbyterian minister brought the matter to the attention of William J. Youngs, secretary to the Governor. Mr. Youngs, who has been a District Attorney himself, looked over the case and came to the conclusion that the man never could have Meet Me at the Fountain.

The Fourth Annual White Fair

begins at The Big Store Tuesday, Jan. 2, 1900, and will equal in scope and importance the previous three events to which it owes its renown. You know by this time that this is not a spasmodic effort—not the creation of the moment—but a carefully mapped out, skilfully generaled merchandise movement of gigantic proportions—to the preparation of which we have devoted months of study and labor, and all the "money-saving" energy our great organization is capable of.

The sale embraces, in addition to Women's and Children's Muslin Underwear and its kindred branches, also Housekeeping Linens and Cottons, and Gentlemen's White Shirts, Collars and Cuffs—in fact everything the component parts of which are cotton or linen, and the very fact that it is offered in this sale should and will be a sufficient warranty for substantial, reliable quality.

And now but one more word—about prices. Cottons and Linens have advanced very much during the past twelve months. Goods that a year ago were 5c. a yard are now worth 8c., and the same appreciation has taken place throughout the many grades and kinds of white goods. It became very much more difficult therefore to produce merchandise that would retain all the finish and careful workmanship you require of us at prices that would look attractive. We believe that we have solved the problem, and take great pleasure to-day in submitting to you

Our Opening Attractions for Tuesday's Sale.

MAZET COMMITTEE SPLIT

Veil Kept Over Croton Watershed Condemnation Proceedings.

MR. MOSS WANTED TO LIFT IT

Had Witnesses on Hand Last Day Committee Sat—Prominent Republicans Involved.

It was admitted yesterday by Frank Moss, senior counsel to the Mazet committee, that another cause besides the fact that he had subpoenaed Senator Thomas C. Platt led to the sudden abandonment of the investigation. Mr. Moss, in fact, has never yet said that he had sent a subpoena to Senator Platt, but he has refrained from denying that this was one reason why the Republican members of the committee, without notice to him, decided that the inquiry had gone far enough, and failed to appear on the last day appointed for a session. He declared yesterday, however, that one matter was left untouched which he had been extremely desirous of exploiting, and which might have involved well-known Republicans as well as Democrats in a scandal of large proportions.

In his recent report to the committee, under the heading "Condemnation Proceedings," Mr. Moss recommended the appointment of a permanent board or commission of condemnation, which had been suggested previously by Controller Coler.

"On the last day at which testimony was taken," said Mr. Moss yesterday, "there were present F. M. Agor, the Postmaster of Mahopac; David Lockwood and Marian Ganun of Carmel, and Hart Curry of this city, all of whom had been subpoenaed to tell what they knew of the Croton watershed condemnation proceedings. There was also present George W. Hart of Brooklyn, who formerly lived in Westchester County. Mr. Hart, who is familiar with the methods that have been pursued by the various Croton Watershed Commissions, had permitted his name to be used in connection with published accounts of the scandals connected with these proceedings, and was prepared to give evidence which I desired to have on the record. I had also subpoenaed Assistant Corporation Counsel George L. Sterling, who has general charge of condemnation matters.

"All of these witnesses were present on the last day on which the committee listened to evidence, and some of them would have been called to the stand if there had been a session in the afternoon. They were also subpoenaed for the day appointed for the next session—the one that never was held. On the day that these witnesses first appeared, ex-Assemblyman Emerson W. Addis, the Republican leader of Putnam County, was about the committee room. It has been intimated that he was there to induce the members to prevent me from going into the Croton watershed condemnation matter, because the evidence might have involved prominent Republicans. I make no such charge, and do not impugn the motives of the committeemen in respect to this or any other matter. All I can say is that by the failure of the committee to hold further sessions, I was prevented from bringing out the facts in regard to this subject.

"The evidence, if it could have been presented, would have more than borne out what I said in my report in regard to these condemnation proceedings. The facts are already pretty well known. Dilatory methods have been pursued by the Commissioners in order to obtain additional fees, and many of the Commissioners are utterly unfit for the work. Some of them have dragged their work along for five years, drawing $10 a day all the time. The entire system is scandalous and its continuance should not be tolerated."

Chairman Mazet declined to discuss this latest alleged reason for the sudden adjournment of the committee. Assemblyman Fallows of the committee said that it was all news to him, and that he had not even been aware that Mr. Moss had subpoenaed any witnesses in regard to the Croton watershed condemnations.

Corporation Counsel Whalen said he did not care to comment on Mr. Moss's charges with reference to the methods of the Commissioners in the Croton watershed condemnation cases, as all these proceedings were started under his predecessors, upon whose administrations he did not wish to reflect. He said, however, that he had been doing his utmost since he took office to wind up these proceedings. There were twenty-one commissions when his term commenced, of which seven had since reported and nine had completed the taking of evidence, while five were still at work. Between Dec. 6, 1893, and Sept. 6, 1899, these commissions had awarded $68,860 for sixty-four parcels of real estate. A computation shows that at the rate of $10 a day for each of the three members of each of the twenty-one commissions, the city has been paying about three times this amount annually in fees to the Commissioners.

50,000 MINERS MAY STRIKE.

Movement Starts Among Pennsylvania Bituminous Coal Men.

ALTOONA, Penn., Dec. 30.—The bituminous coal miners of this section met in convention at Portage last night and ordered a strike Jan. 1. About 1,000 men at the Portage, Puritan, and near-by collieries are involved. Sessions were also held at Barnsborough and Patton, at which points the miners also voted to strike for the increase demanded at the recent Clearfield convention. At these places, however, the men will await the action of the United Mine Workers, now in session at Indianapolis.

The action of the miners is regarded in this section as the beginning of a movement which will result in the calling out of nearly 50,000 miners.

CHICAGO ARBITRATION BOARD.

Plan to Prevent Further Trouble in the Building Trades.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—A permanent arbitration board to settle differences between labor unions and building contractors was practically assured to-day. At the meeting of the Building Trades' Council and the Building Trade Contractors' Council, the report of the Joint Conference Committee representing the two organizations was accepted.

The permanent Arbitration Board will consist of eleven members, and will adjudicate all difficulties that may arise. Plans for the formation of this board, as recommended by the committee, show a few changes from the original scheme presented by Martin B. Madden and accepted on last Tuesday by the committee. The principal change was the recommendation that all difficulties must be settled within one day. This was made at the request of the Building Trades' Council delegates, in order that contractors might not have an opportunity to complete jobs while trouble that had arisen in their execution was being settled by the Arbitration Board. Another change made at the request of the laboring men was the insertion of a clause providing that the eleventh man should not be a Judge.

The acceptance of the plan settles the question of sympathetic strikes, since if all troubles are arbitrated, there will be no necessity for any kind of a strike, except as a last resort.

Boy Drowned While Skating.

HACKENSACK, N. J., Dec. 30.—Robert Lieberg, twelve years old, a step-son of George Hold of Riveredge, was drowned in the Hackensack River to-day. Lieberg, who was skating with a number of companions, ventured out too far, and the thin ice gave way. A companion, who was close behind him, also went through. The latter was rescued in an exhausted condition.

Killed in a Freight Train Wreck.

SPARTANBURG, S. C., Dec. 30.—A freight train ran into a construction train near Duncan Station this afternoon. Philip Matchett of the Phoenix Bridge Company was instantly killed. Matchett was from Pennsylvania. Henry Foster, colored, of Clifton, S. C., was fatally injured.

Record of the St. Louis for 1899.

The American Line steamship St. Louis, which arrived yesterday, has completed seventeen round trips this year and run over 105,400 miles in that period, a greater distance than any other vessel of that line. She has also carried this year more passengers out of New York than any other steamer which sailed from this port.

THE BIG PAPER FACTORY FIRE.

Pulling Down the Ruined Walls—The Firm's Estimate of the Loss —Employes Paid.

Columns of smoke and steam arose all day yesterday from the ruins of the great wall paper factory of William Campbell & Co., 425 to 435 East Twenty-fourth Street, which was destroyed by fire late Friday night, and as the heat died out in the ruined walls that still stood ice formed upon them in many fantastic shapes where the streams of water fell.

James F. Shaughnessy of Truck 11 was the only one of the injured firemen who remained in Bellevue last evening. He is severely burned about the head, and the doctors say that, while his condition is not dangerous, it will be several days before he will be able to leave the hospital. George K. Burns of Engine No. 23, who fell and hurt his leg, left the hospital against the advice of the physicians.

Superintendent Dooner of the Building Department, with a force of men, started in as soon as the walls cooled to throw down such parts as endangered passers by, and many of the 400 employes of the burned paper mill stood about and watched them at their work with a disconsolate aid.

Commissioner Thomas J. Brady of the Building Department said that the owners of the property had been compelled to put in many new columns and girders when the structure was changed from a sugar refinery to an electric light plant seven years ago, but he thought that at the time of the fire it was in as good condition as any similar building, which, like it, had stood for forty years, could be.

J. H. Temple, the member of the firm who looks after the manufacturing part of the business, said yesterday in the temporary office, at 209 East Twenty-third Street, that Chief Croker's estimate placing the total loss at $750,000 was about correct, but the concern would suffer much more through the loss of business. There were 6,000,000 rolls of finished paper burned, he said, and the fire had occurred at the very worst time of the year for the firm, as the heaviest shipments are made in December, January, and February, and had the factory stood, yesterday would have been the heaviest shipping day in the entire year, many orders being placed months before to be filled on Jan. 1.

Mr. Temple said his partner, Robert J. Dyatt, who is the financial man of the firm, was on his way from Chicago yesterday.

Although the pay roll and money for the employes were in the ruins, all hands were paid off in the afternoon according to their own statements and the recollections of the timekeepers, so that none should enter upon the new year without ready money. None of the persons concerned could advance any plausible theory as to the origin of the fire. It could not have been an electric wire, Mr. Temple said, for the firm generates its own current and the dynamos had been stopped before the blaze was discovered.

Men from the Manhattan Electric Light Company were engaged in cutting connecting the lines that had been supplied from their plant, which was destroyed with adjoining systems, and before nightfall it was said that the greater part, if not all, of the lights would be then in use in the district which was left in darkness by the fire and which extends from Fourteenth to Fifty-ninth Street, from Third Avenue to the East River.

THE UNDERWRITERS' ESTIMATE.

Insurance Men Discouraged by New Addition to Year's Losses.

The aggregate loss sustained by the insurance companies in the fire which destroyed the wall paper factory of William Campbell & Co., in East Twenty-fourth Street, Friday night, was roughly estimated by underwriters yesterday as not likely to fall below $700,000.

This loss, coming at almost the end of the year, whose fire losses had already been the severest in ten years, caused a feeling of discouragement in the insurance offices, and gave rise to further reports as to the probable effect of the year upon the weaker companies.

The insurance on the wall paper plant of William Campbell & Co. was distributed as follows: On Building—London Lloyds, $40,000; Liverpool and London and Globe, $15,000; Manufacturers' Lloyds, $7,500; Baloise, $7,500; New York Underwriters', Phoenix of London, State of New York, Sun, and Netherlands, $5,000 each; Aachen and Munich, $3,500; Agricultural, $3,000; Aachen Reinsurance, Chicago, Globe and Rutgers, Norwich Union, Globe, Thuringia American, and Fidelity, $2,500 each; Manufacturers' and Merchants' of Rockford, $2,000; Queen, Delaware, Kent, Quebec, Home of Baltimore, and Svea, $1,500 each; total, $130,000.

Tug Vigilant Burned.

The tug Vigilant, owned by Capt. Conroy and chartered by Contractor Rogers to take soundings for the foundation of the new bridge across the Harlem at Lenox Avenue, was burned and sunk about 3 o'clock yesterday morning while moored off the foot of East One Hundred and Fifty-first Street. None of the crew was on board, and it is not known how the boat caught fire.

Telephone Company Incorporated.

ALBANY, Dec. 30.—There was incorporated with the Secretary of State to-day the Farmers and Merchants' Telephone and Telegraph Company of New York City, with a capital stock of $100,000. The route will cover New York State, and the Directors are John H. Farrell of Albany, George Sheppard, Pittsburg; George W. Beers, Fort Wayne, Ind.; Ezra M. Higgins and J. George Kaelber, Rochester; Titus Sheard, Little Falls; Edward F. Murray, Troy; and Robert E. Drake and George W. Pulver, Syracuse.

May Prevent a Pottery Trust.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 30.—The Robinson-Merrill Pottery Company of Akron filed articles of incorporation with the Secretary of State to-day. The capital stock is $500,000. The three concerns composing the new company are the Robinson Company, the E. H. Merrill Company, and Markle & Son. It is generally believed that the incorporation of these three concerns will effectually prevent the formation of a pottery trust.

BROOKLYN TRANSFER FIGHT

Board of Railroad Commissioners Acts on Complaints.

Says Road Is Doing as Much as Possible for Patrons, but Should Give Optional Transfers.

ALBANY, Dec. 30.—The State Board of Railroad Commissioners to-day rendered its report in the matter of the group of complaints lodged against the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company by associated bodies and citizens of South Brooklyn, together with miscellaneous grievances regarding the operation of the system. These complaints, which deal with the affairs of Flushing, Corona, and adjacent places, are not considered in this report. The report says, in part:

"At the outset it is not improper to say that the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company is engaged in the herculean and difficult task of operating the longest and most complex system of street railways in the world, covering a total length of 504 miles. The geography of the territory and the peculiar convergence of almost every one of the car lines, surface or elevated, toward the common centre of the borough and, to the Brooklyn Bridge, add greatly to what would be normal perplexities of any equally extensive system, but even these are added to by the contiguity of the vast Borough of Manhattan, formerly the old City of New York.

"No perfect and satisfactory system of operation and accommodation, either to the public or the transportation company, can be devised, and most certainly no permanent relief afforded to the public, until some of the projected new tunnels or bridges between the two boroughs are constructed. The people will best and most effectually aid themselves to this end by lending their earnest influence to the prosecution of these projects.

"In respect to these complaints of insufficient cars, it may be said and it is the fact that there is not, and not likely to be, in Manhattan Borough and Brooklyn for many years, a time when all cars will be otherwise than overcrowded during the morning and evening hours if real rapid transit is required at the same time. If there were fewer cars running the rapid movements of all would be facilitated.

"With respect to rolling stock, the company's surface car equipment is equal in quality, comfort, and condition to that of any other company of which this board has knowledge, in any city. Most of the cars are of modern pattern and almost if not quite new, and all are well lighted and warmed in Winter by electricity. The management of the company is earnest in its efforts to afford facilities to the more than 315,000,000 of passengers which it now is and will hereafter be called upon annually to accommodate.

"No other street railway managers have ever grappled with so difficult a problem, and there is much to be wrought out by experiment and practical demonstration through results. The handling of the vast multitude of people who in the Summer will pass over these lines from the Borough of Manhattan and contiguous communities, using Brooklyn, literally, as a highway to Coney Island and the scores of other seaside or rural resorts on Long Island, promises to give the company not merely a vast amount of business and revenue, but to bring before it some operating problems of the first magnitude.

"The board has, incidental to this present investigation and report, given attention to this question of next Summer's traffic, for the reason that it would have been unwise and insufficient to have made orders which might have relieved conditions at this time, but which would have led to great confusion and inefficiency three or six months hence. These considerations of the future, though not specifically raised by the complaints themselves, have influenced the board largely in making the principal recommendations embraced in this report. The board therefore determines and recommends:

"That the company grant optional free transfers at all hours at Third Avenue and Sixty-fifth Street and at Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street, available for use on either elevated or surface lines.

"The board recognizes here a doubt regarding its power to require the company to issue interchangeable transfer on a single fare between the surface and the elevated lines, but this recommendation is made, although such a transfer may be a privilege rather than a right, in the belief that the company will grant it. In making this recommendation the board is actuated by the belief that the company's order of Nov. 1, issuing limited transfers at these points, was made on the well-based and practical conclusion that it was desirable to induce the long-distance riders from Bay Ridge, Fort Hamilton, Bensonhurst, New Utrecht, and the West End of Coney Island to use the elevated railways, so as to enable the company to give a fuller service and better accommodation to the short-distance riders of Third and Fifth Avenues and their connections.

"The board will require the company to run as many trains or cars on all lines as will reasonably accommodate the traffic, under safe rules of operation and up to a numerical point that will not paralyze reasonably quick transit. That a suitable passenger waiting room, more commodious than the present one and properly cleaned, warmed, and lighted, be provided and maintained at the Sixty-fifth Street surface station and on the westerly side of Third Avenue, if practicable. That a covered platform be provided and maintained at the joint transfer station at Thirty-sixth Street and Fifth Avenue. That a convenient waiting room or shelter be provided and maintained at Fifth Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street for passengers using the junction or transfer point of the Hamilton Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street lines.

"That the contemplated change in the system of lighting the cars on the elevated lines 'from oil to electricity' may be put into effect at the earliest practicable period. That no cars which have been used as smoking cars shall be used as ordinary passenger coaches thereafter unless they are first thoroughly cleaned and deodorized. That the station signs on the elevated lines be painted in black and white and placed in more conspicuous places than they now generally occupy.

"The board declines to recommend that the Fortieth Street station platform on the Third Avenue elevated line be inclosed, for the reason that the patronage at this station is amply provided for by the present well-built waiting room on the platform."

LOST CHILD STILL WON'T TALK.

No One Has Called for the Strange Girl at the Gerry Society.

The four-year-old girl, with wavy brown hair and gray eyes, who was found last Wednesday night at Fifty-fourth Street and Eighth Avenue, and who astonished every one by her beautiful singing and as much astonished them by her refusal or inability to talk, is at the rooms of the Gerry society still unclaimed.

She still nods in the affirmative or shakes her head in the negative when spoken to, and never speaks. The child is as much of an enigma to the Gerry people as she was to Matron Travers at Police Headquarters.

Consolidated Traction Company Paid.

David Young, manager of the North Jersey Street Railroad Company, said yesterday at Jersey City regarding the injunction issued out of the United States court at Trenton on Friday restraining the company from paying $300,000 in dividends to the stockholders of the Consolidated Traction Company of Jersey City, whose lines are leased to the North Jersey, that he had received no legal notice of the court's action. He added that the notice would come too late, anyway, as the $300,000 involved had been paid over to the officials of the Consolidated Traction Company at noon.

$65,000 Needed for Woman's Hotel.

Subscriptions to the proposed woman's hotel to the amount of $10,000 have come in since the recent publication of the letter from Charles D. Kellogg, Secretary of the Woman's Hotel Company. This leaves $65,000 still to be raised. Mr. Kellogg said yesterday that the time limit would expire Monday at midnight. He felt confident, he said, that the amount would be subscribed by that time.

Commander and Mrs. Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army sailed yesterday for Liverpool by the steamer Campania. There is to be a grand conclave of members of the Salvation Army in the United States, and the Commander is going to see Gen. William Booth in regard to it. Mrs. Booth-Tucker has been ill, and will probably not return with her husband.

NEWS OF THE RAILROADS.

PULLMAN-WAGNER DEAL LAWFUL.

Judge Tuthill of Chicago Refuses to Issue an Injunction.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—Judge Tuthill of the Superior Court refused to-day to issue the injunction prayed for by Truman A. Taylor, a stockholder in the Pullman Palace Car Company, to prevent the merging of that company and the Wagner Palace Car Company, under the name of the Pullman Company. Judge Tuthill declared that the allegations of the bill did not contain sufficient grounds for the issuance of the injunction.

It was claimed in the bill of complaint that, through the consolidation of the companies, a monopoly of the sleeping-car business would be created in violation of the anti-trust act. Judge Tuthill held that the sleeping-car business was in the control of the railroad companies, and that a combination between them would have to be shown before any monopoly of the business could be declared. The sleeping car companies, he said, were only the agents of the railroads acting under contracts.

The transfer of the stock of the Pullman Company for the purchase of the Wagner Company's property can now be consummated.

CONNECTICUT RAILROAD REPORT.

Most Prosperous Year in the History of the Lines.

Special to The New York Times.

STAMFORD, Conn., Dec. 30.—The annual report of the Railroad Commissioners, submitted to Gov. Lounsbury yesterday, shows that the last year has been the most prosperous for the railroads in their history. The report is based on the annual returns of the steam and street railroad companies compiled for the fiscal year ended June 30. The gross sum of the earnings reported is $38,663,732.27, being $1,169,987.17 in excess of the earnings of the previous year. The passenger earnings are credited with $516,092.59 of this increase, and the freight earnings with $635,529.29. The railroad business has been better for the last six months than during the six months previous to June 30. Last week the freight yards in Stamford became congested, owing to the unprecedented quantity of freight going over the line, and it was necessary to send out fifty-one extra freight trains before the yards were relieved.

For the first time in the history of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, its freight earnings this year have exceeded the passenger earnings by more than $2,000,000.

Of the 50,269,468 passengers carried by all the roads during the year, only eight have been injured and none killed.

ROCKAWAY VALLEY ROAD SOLD.

Purchasers Will Build a New Line from Paterson to Trenton.

MORRISTOWN, N. J., Dec. 30.—The interests held in the Rockaway Valley Railroad by the late James N. Pidcock have been purchased by Haines Brothers of New York, and F. A. Melick of Morristown. This gives to the purchasers a controlling interest in the company. They intend to use the road as a nucleus for a new road from Paterson to Trenton. The Rockaway Road is single-tracked, and runs from Morristown to Whitehouse Junction on the Central Road, a distance of twenty miles.

The proposed road will diagonally traverse the northern section of the State, passing through six counties, and will open up new territory that it is expected will furnish much country produce for transportation to the markets of Paterson, Newark, and New York.

To complete the new railroad between Paterson and Trenton, it is proposed to build eighteen miles of railroad between Morristown and Paterson and eleven miles of railroad from Whitehouse to Flemington, where connection will be made that will permit a terminal at the State capital. By Spring it is expected that all will be in readiness to begin the construction of the proposed extensions.

It proposes to operate a standard gauge road two miles long, from a point on the line of the Long Island Railroad at Laurel Hill, Borough of Queens, to Newtown Creek. The capital stock is $500,000, and the Directors are Henry V. Palmer, Joseph F. Keany, William L. C. Allan, J. R. Melcher of Brooklyn; Reon Barnes, Borough of Richmond; Harvey A. Herrold, Thomas P. GEN. WOOD'S CABINET.

The Prospective Appointments Give General Satisfaction in Cuba.

HAVANA, Dec. 30.—The names of the members of Gen. Wood's Cabinet and the assignment of portfolios will be issued to-morrow. It is believed that the list will be as follows:

Secretary of State and Government—Senor DIEGO TAMAYO.
Secretary of Justice—Senor LUIS ESTEVEZ.
Secretary of Education—Senor JUAN BAUTISTA HERNANDEZ.
Secretary of Finance—Senor ENRIQUE VARONA.
Secretary of Public Works—Senor JOSE RAMON VILLALON.
Secretary of Agriculture, Industry, and Commerce—Senor RIUS RIVERA.

All of these names, with the exception of that of Señor Hernandez, have been expected for the past few days. The mention of the name of Señor Hernandez as Secretary of Education came as a surprise, although he holds an important professorship in the university and is prominent in Cuban national affairs. The papers generally have given the Governor General great credit for the other five appointments, and from a Cuban point of view the Cabinet is considered a strong one.

The Mayors of all the towns and cities in the Province of Santa Clara have held a meeting in order to determine for what they should petition the coming Council.

Cheap Labor Threatens Cuba.

HAVANA, Dec. 30.—The Heraldo says there is a growing danger of Cubans and other old workers being underbid in the labor markets of Havana by Spaniards, who, coming fresh from Spain, where they are accustomed to work for almost nothing, eagerly snatch any employment for half the usual wages. Instead of allowing immigrants to swamp the labor markets of the towns, the Heraldo thinks a bureau should undertake to direct the immigrants to the country districts, where work is to be had.

Gen. Wilson Ordered to Washington.

HAVANA, Dec. 30.—Gen. Wilson has been ordered to report at Washington, and it is believed here that this means he will not return to Cuba.

NATIONAL GUARD'S MERITS

Gen. Roe Says Disturbing Effects of War Are Disappearing.

Criticism of Work in Camp—Recommendation that Congress Determine the Guard's Status.

Major Gen. Charles F. Roe, commanding the National Guard of the State, submitted his report to the Governor yesterday. The following are the important features of the report, Gen. Roe stating, first:

"The National Guard consists at this day of 187 signal corps troops, batteries, and companies, organized in five brigades, 15 regiments, 5 battalions, 1 squadron, 4 signal corps, 1 separate troop of cavalry, 4 batteries, and 1 separate company of infantry.

"The strength of the National Guard, as reported Sept. 30, 1899, is 795 officers and 13,439 enlisted men, as follows:

	Officers.	Enlisted Men.
General and staff officers	69	...
Signal Corps	10	137
Cavalry	28	327
Artillery	22	355
Infantry	671	12,620
Total	795	13,439

CONDITION OF THE GUARD.

Referring to the condition of the Guard, Gen. Roe says:

"The condition of the National Guard is, generally speaking, good; the re-establishment of the organizations returning from the United States service, disbandments, and reorganizations, necessarily had a disturbing effect, which, however, now is disappearing, and officers and men are settling down to work with a spirit which promises good results for the future. All of the organizations are thoroughly equipped and provided with camp equipage and ammunition for field service.

"The infantry of the National Guard is now armed with Springfield rifles, calibre .45; the artillery with 3.2-inch guns, with the exception of the Third Battery, which is armed with almost unserviceable Gatling guns and requires new guns; and the cavalry with the Springfield carbine, calibre .45.

"The equipments in use by the Guard are all serviceable, mostly new, and of approved pattern.

"The uniforms received from the State, are practically new and under the new rules adopted fit the men well. A working uniform of canvas or khaki should be issued by the State, if practicable, for field service and rifle practice, to save the more expensive so-called undress uniforms.

ON THE APPROPRIATION.

"The appropriation for the fiscal year 1899-1900 for the Naval Militia and the National Guard is $400,000, $50,000 less than heretofore. After deducting the allowances provided by law for headquarters and organizations, there will be left of this appropriation for service, uniforming, equipping, and other expenses about $165,000.

"To put half of the National Guard in camp and on field service will cost about that amount, leaving practically nothing for the Naval Militia and nothing for uniforming and equipping the land and naval forces of the State.

"Unless the troops can have active service at least once in two years their employment in case of necessity or emergency would not only not be advantageous to the State and country, but would entail heavy hardships and privations on those employed, and in the end prove the very reverse of good economy.

"I recommend, therefore, that the annual appropriation for the National Guard be made at least $450,000; that a separate appropriation be made for the Naval Militia, as was done originally, and that the appropriation of the balance of the so-called war fund for the purposes of the National Guard be renewed, reappropriated for the purpose of completing the arming, equipping, and uniforming of the National Guard and Naval Militia, and to defray the expenses of field and camp service.

"I recommend, further, that such action be taken as may be required to cause Congress to pass an act authorizing an exchange of the Springfield rifles and carbines in the hands of the National Guard for rifles and carbines of the kind used by the United States regular army."

FIELD SERVICE.

"Regiments on duty at the Camp of Instruction were required to enter on practice marches by battalions, one battalion leaving camp on Monday, returning on Wednesday, when the other battalion would leave on like duty, returning on Friday.

"These march outs from the Camp of Instruction at Peekskill, making and breaking of camp twice, preparing of food in company messes, marching as through an enemy's country, with advance guard, rear guard, and flankers, were conducted with great care and entered into with enthusiasm by all of the organizations at the Camp of Instruction this year. Inspecting officers of my staff accompanied each column and rendered reports, copies of which were sent to each commanding officer.

"The most important criticism to be made is that the marches were made too rapidly, each battalion trying to outvie the other in the march, thereby unnecessarily tiring the men and losing sight of the important fact that every precaution should be taken to bring the command into camp in as good a condition as possible. The best march is not the most rapid, but the one in which the men are brought to camp in the best condition.

GUARD DUTY CRITICISED.

"The general performance of guard duty was not as good as it should be. Careful instruction seems to have been given in some cases, but the men did not grasp the subject or consider it of sufficient importance.

"The incinerators worked in the most satisfactory manner, and I would recommend that sufficient be purchased by the State to have the requisite number at each camp to save transportation back and forth.

"The field service of the Seventy-fourth Regiment and Sixth Battery was carried out in a most satisfactory manner.

"As regards practice marches and field service, it is sufficient to say that the Spanish-American war has shown conclusively that the National Guard was very weak in this respect.

"The expenses of the camp and field service were $81,037.92.

SMALL ARMS PRACTICE.

"All organizations have participated in small arms practice without exception, and, notwithstanding the process of reorganization, 10,045 officers and enlisted men (naval militia included) practiced at the various outdoor ranges in the course of this year.

"The result of the year's practice shows that 8,184 officers and enlisted men qualified as experts, sharpshooters, and marksmen, or 81.47 per cent. of the number practicing.

"Steps should be taken to acquire a sufficient amount of land in rear of the long range targets at Creedmoor so as to render this range absolutely safe and avoid a recurrence of complaints and accidents, the land required for this purpose would be about thirty-five acres. The ranges at Bath and Tonawanda should be made pistol ranges, and repairs are also needed at other ranges.

ARTILLERY PRACTICE.

"During the tour of duty at the Camp of Instruction of the Third Battery, June 10 to 17, 1899, Lieut. Col. N. B. Thurston, Inspector of Small Arms Practice and ordnance officer, supervised the practice of the Third Battery with ball ammunition. The object of the practice was to test the efficiency of the Gatlings under actual firing conditions, and the result was not satisfactory. The guns are of calibre .50 and obsolete.

"The target practice with shell and shrapnel of the First Battery for the Flanigan Trophy at the Camp of Instruction on Thursday, June 22, 1899, and of the Second Battery for the same trophy on Thursday, June 29, 1899, was supervised by the same officer. The practice of the Sixth Battery was supervised by Col. E. M. Hoffman, Inspector, at Binghamton, N. Y. The trophy was won by the Second Battery.

"The range used was 1,000 yards, competition by one platoon of each battery, and each piece firing five shells and five shrapnels.

Score:

First Battery, shells—55 hits, shrapnels—215 hits, total 270
Second Battery, shells—170 hits, shrapnels 1,249 hits, total 1,419

GATLING GUNS USELESS.

"The practice of the Third Battery, it is said, demonstrated that its Gatling guns were useless, and a board has been appointed to recommend a new gun.

In connection with the Dewey parade in this city, Gen. Roe says: "The conduct of the troops in journeying to and from New York City and while in the latter place was very creditable and gratifying; no accidents of any serious nature occurred and the appearance of the troops on the parade was a source of pride to those interested. There were reported present of the National Guard on Sept. 30, 1899, 712 officers, 11,092 enlisted men, aggregate 11,804."

Under the head of service in aid of the civil authorities, the General thus comments:

"The placing of guards in armories to care for arms, equipments, &c., and holding the guard in readiness in times of threatened disorder to answer calls of the civil authorities, is believed to have a very beneficial effect and a strong tendency toward preventing violence."

ON THE STATUS OF THE GUARD.

The General, in concluding his report, says:

"I desire to call attention especially to the absolute necessity of Congress fixing by law the status of the National Guard plainly and unequivocally, so that he who reads may understand. There is unfortunately a great uncertainty on the subject pervading the mind of the people at large. This uncertainty to a large extent affects the National Guard unfavorably. I submit, the National Guard is, first and foremost, a State guard; secondly, under certain contingencies, a reserve force for the National Government, subject to the orders of the President of the United States, and when required by the United States it should not be asked to volunteer, but ordered into the United States service as it stands and is organized under State laws."

FATHER MALONE'S FUNERAL.

Father Belford Takes Charge of the Parish and Removes Young Malone from the McCaddin Memorial.

The body of Father Malone last night reposed on a catafalque in the parlor of the rectory at 69 South Third Street, Brooklyn. A laurel wreath was received at the house from Chauncey Olcott, the actor, with the inscription, "In Loving Remembrance." Among the callers were Mrs. Theodore Havemeyer, widow of the dead Sugar King, who had known Father Malone for many years. She brought with her a box containing cut flowers, which she placed beside the body. Many of the parishioners passed in and out of the building, and the emotion of those was so great that they could scarcely conceal it.

The programme touching the funeral on Tuesday had not been arranged up to last night. Some of the pall bearers will probably be the intimate friends of the dead priest. The funeral will unquestionably be the largest ever seen in Williamsburg, and clergymen of every denomination have expressed their intention of being present. The requiem mass will last at least two hours, and all the Catholic priests who will be in attendance at the church will accompany the remains to Calvary Cemetery.

In order to put a stop to the unseemly scandal in connection with the last illness of Father Malone, Bishop McDonnell yesterday delegated the Rev. John L. Belford of St. Dominic's Church in Oyster Bay to take charge of the parish. Father Belford's first act was to dismiss Sylvester L. Malone, Father Malone's nephew, from the management of the McCaddin Memorial Hall.

OPERATION AFTER 35 YEARS.

Mr. Lee was one of the first to offer his services to the Union after Fort Sumter was fired upon, and went to the front as a non-commissioned officer in the Twelfth New York Battery. While trying to save his guns in one of the hardest battles of the war, he was made a prisoner and sent to Andersonville. While in prison he trod on some broken glass, portions of which lodged in his left foot. He thought he had all of it removed, but a few years ago the injured member began to pain him intensely at times, and he attributed the pain to rheumatism. Doctors agreed with him as to the diagnosis. Recently the foot troubled him more than ever, and he soon noticed a decided discoloration.

Coming to New York, he placed himself under the care of Dr. Helmuth, who almost immediately amputated the great and fourth toes, in each of which many particles of glass were found.

Mr. Lee yesterday expressed confidence in his ability to shortly return to his home at Ballston Spa.

MOLINEUX SEES HIS BROTHER.

H. C. Molineux, the younger brother of Roland B. Molineux, called at the Tombs yesterday to pay a visit to his brother. Deputy Warden Flynn escorted Roland B. Molineux to the counsel room. The brothers embraced and appeared to be overjoyed in seeing one another. They conversed for an hour. Molineux appears to be in good health, and wears the same air of confidence that has always characterized him.

TO ARREST GEN. MERCIER

French Government Said to Have Decided to Prosecute Him.

NEW HIGH COURT SUGGESTED

Arraignment of the General May Be Announced When the Chamber of Deputies Assembles.

PARIS, Dec. 30.—There are persistent reports in Nationalist circles that the Government has decided upon the arrest and the prosecution of Gen. Mercier before a second High Court immediately. It is added that an important debate respecting the conspiracy cases and the charges against Gen. Mercier will take place in the Chamber of Deputies as soon as the session begins, and it is said the Premier, M. Waldeck-Rousseau, will reply to his adversaries by announcing the arrest of Gen. Mercier and his arraignment before the High Court. The Nationalist organs insist that the Government has decided on the plan, but they suggest that it may be changed, in view of its premature revelation.

Gen. Mercier, at the present moment, is a Senatorial candidate in the Loire-Inferieure. One of his friends, who was interviewed on the subject, said the General had resolved not to discuss the matter, as he was determined not to give the Government a weapon to use against him. He was convinced, however, that his arrest would sound the defeat of the Government candidates in the Senatorial elections, while he, himself, was certain of election.

It is expected that the present trial before the High Court will be concluded in the middle of next week, and MM. Deroulède and Guerin will almost certainly be convicted, although some of the other prisoners will probably be acquitted.

The Journal des Debats to-night says: "The nearer the trial draws to a conclusion the plainer the emptiness of the charges becomes. Agitation, demonstrations, and a few slight offenses have perhaps occurred, but there is no evidence shown of the concerted plot or crime against the State, the repression of which the Public Prosecutor demands."

The Journal des Debats concludes by expressing itself in favor of the simple solution of the unsatisfactory situation suggested by the Figaro, namely, that M. Waldeck-Rousseau accord to the convicted prisoners the benefit of the Berenger law, which pardons first offenders.

SIR JAMES PAGET DEAD.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The death is announced of Sir James Paget, in his eighty-sixth year.

Sir James Paget, first Baronet of the line, was one of the most famous English surgeons of the century. Since 1863 he had been surgeon to the Prince of Wales, and since 1877 Serjeant Surgeon to Queen Victoria. He was born at Great Yarmouth, Jan. 11, 1814, being the son of a merchant of that city. In 1836 he became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons and seven years later, after he had made a reputation by some novel and brilliant operations, was made an Honorary Fellow of that institution. In 1844 he married Miss Lydia North daughter of the domestic chaplain to the Queen's father, the late Duke of Kent.

Sir James made many contributions to the sum of knowledge now possessed by the surgeons of the world. Among his best known literary works are the "Pathological Catalogue of the Museum of the College of Surgeons," "Report on the Results of the Use of the Microscope," published in 1842, and "Lectures on Surgical Pathology," published in 1853, 1863, and 1868. He was also an extensive contributor to the "Transactions" of the Royal Society, of which he was a Fellow, and other learned institutions. In 1875 Sir James was elected President of the Royal College of Surgeons, and from 1884 to 1895 he was Vice Chancellor of the University of London. He was created a Baronet in August, 1871, as a recognition of his many discoveries in surgery. In 1881 he was appointed a member of the royal commission to inquire into the condition of the London hospitals for small-pox and fever cases. At the jubilee, in 1882, in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Wurzburg, he was one of the foreign scientific celebrities who received honors.

For many years Sir James had been consulting surgeon of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He was also a corresponding member of the Institute of France and an Honorary Fellow of many universities and other institutions.

DUKE OF CONNAUGHT ADVANCED

Third Son of the Queen Appointed to Command the British Forces in Ireland.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The Queen has approved the appointment of the Duke of Connaught as Commander in Chief of the British forces in Ireland.

The position of commander of the British forces in Ireland is only second in importance to that of Commander in Chief. However, the Duke of Connaught's appointment will be no surprise in Great Britain, as, when Gen. Lord Roberts took command of the army in South Africa, the position belonged to the Duke by right of seniority.

His Royal Highness was born at Buckingham Palace in 1850, being the third son of Queen Victoria. He entered the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich as a cadet in 1868, and the following year was appointed a Lieutenant in the Royal Artillery. In March, 1879, he married the Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia, third daughter of the late Prince Frederick Charles, and grandniece of Emperor William I.

The Duke has occupied many important staff positions in the British Army establishment. In 1873 he was Brigade Major at Aldershot; in 1875 and 1876 Assistant Adjutant General at Gibraltar, in 1880 a General of Brigade at Aldershot, in 1888 he commanded the Meerut Division in the Bengal Presidency, and from 1886 to 1890 he was Commander in Chief of the British forces in Bengal. On his return to England in the latter year he was appointed Commander in Chief of the Southern Home District. In August, 1893, he became Commander in Chief at Aldershot.

Although he has made many efforts to take an active part in the campaign in South Africa, the Government has refused to grant permission to do so to the Duke. However, he has seen some active service. At his own earnest solicitation, and much against the wishes of the Queen, he was appointed in 1882 to command the brigade of Household Cavalry in the Egyptian campaign. He was present at the battles of Tel-el-Kebir and Mahshuta, and was three times mentioned in dispatches to the War Office by Lord (then Sir Garnet) Wolseley. It was suggested in one or two of the London newspapers at the time that the Queen's son had been carefully kept out of danger. This accusation was categorically denied by Gen. Wolseley, and after the campaign was completely disproved.

Last year the Duke of Connaught was present at the French Autumn manoeuvres as the guest of the late President Faure.

BALTIMORE BANKS PROSPEROUS.

This Year's Profits Have Been the Largest in Their History.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 30.—The banks and trust companies of Baltimore round out the year with the biggest business in their history to their credit. All of them have prospered and have made more money than ever before. It is not surprising, therefore, that some of them have doubled their dividend rate during the year and that some of the recently formed trust companies have decided to disburse part of their surplus earnings among their stockholders.

During the early part of the year the trust companies handled millions of dollars in securities. Knowledge of their great profits sent the price of their stocks soaring at a rapid rate. At one time the shares of some of the companies sold at nearly six times their par value, and early Spring prices in some instances advanced as much as 82 points. About this time money began to become scarce and holders of stocks were forced to liquidate, with the result that the advances were completely wiped out and losses sustained in many instances. The market developed pronounced strength again in the closing week, and prices are recovering from the low level recorded about the middle of December.

It is estimated that considerably more than $100,000,000 of securities were underwritten in Baltimore during the year. Some of these syndicates are still in existence, though with a few exceptions ruling prices for allotments are still above the subscription price, and the underwriters can sell even now at a profit.

DISASTER OVERTAKES SHIPS.

Vessels Bound to and from American Ports Suffer.

The British steamer Nerano, Capt. Blance, from Leith for Baltimore, has returned to Stornoway with air pump, grating guard, and foot valve broken.

The Norwegian bark Johanne, Capt. Pedersen, from Lonsberg Dec. 9, for Pensacola, has been towed into Cardiff Roads dismasted.

The British steam yacht Sapphire, Capt. Dyason, from Pensacola Dec. 8, via Norfolk Dec. 18, for Amsterdam, with tail shaft broken.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 30.—Capt. Schmidt of the steamer Bosnia, from Hamburg, reports Dec. 28, latitude 39.37, longitude 68.15, wrecks of a schooner, the name of which as near as could be made out was Alfaretta S. Snare; no one was seen on board. The lower part of the foremast was standing and the main rigging hanging over the starboard side. The Alfaretta S. Snare, as before reported, was abandoned on Nov. 12 opposite Cape Cod.

WRECK OF THE GERMAN LINER.

Captain Refuses Assistance—Vessel Does Not Make This Port.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The Hamburg and South American Line steamer Pelotas, from Santos for Rotterdam, which went ashore near Dungeness soon after midnight, during a heavy storm, was laden with coffee and had eight passengers on board. In spite of the heavy weather prevailing, the Dungeness lifeboat succeeded in reaching the steamer, and remained with her all night. The Pelotas is so far inshore that she is left almost dry at low water. Her sternpost and rudder have been washed away.

The Captain of the Pelotas refuses all assistanee, and is rapidly jettisoning her cargo. Tugs are attending her, and it is hoped she will be floated at the next high tide. The gale, however, continues.

The Hamburg and South American Line is in no way connected with the Hamburg-American Line, trading to New York.

SCHOONER FANNIE BROWN LOST.

CHARLESTON, S. C., Dec. 30.—The schooner Margaret B. Roper reached this port to-day from New York with the Captain and crew of eight men of the schooner Fannie Brown, which left here on the 24th with phosphate rock for Baltimore.

On the 26th the Roper and Brown collided, the latter sinking near North Hatteras, off the North Carolina coast. The collision was due to a mistake in signals.

Twenty Sailors Perish in the Sea.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—The British sailing vessel Emily Lloyd has been wrecked near Cherbourg. The Captain and twelve of her crew were drowned. The French steamer St. Jean has been sunk near Brest. Seven of her crew were lost.

YESTERDAY AT THE OPERA.

"Romeo et Juliette" at the Matinee and "Il Trovatore" for the Evening Performance.

Several lessons might be drawn from the performance of "Romeo et Juliette" at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon, but perhaps the most important of all is that it is not always necessary to import high-priced tenors with more or less fictitious reputations. There was not as large an audience yesterday afternoon as there would have been had Jean de Reszke been announced to sing Romeo, and perchance the attendance would have been greater had M. Alvarez been advertised to sing the part, for public curiosity in regard to him is not yet satisfied. But there is room for doubt as to whether the audience would have received any more pleasure from the performance than it did, even if the latter of the two tenors named had sung.

M. Thomas Salignac was the Romeo yesterday afternoon. This gentleman is not rated as one of the stars of the company, and it usually falls to his lot to sing the tenor rôles not coveted by the principals. He has shown a considerable improvement in his vocal method since he came here, though he still succumbs at times to the temptation of the yawning space before him to try to set all its crannies vibrating with big tone. The result is the inevitable departure from the pitch. Aside from a few errors of this kind yesterday, he gave a performance of Romeo which calls for nothing but warm praise. He sang with much taste and feeling and in the exile scene with plenty of dramatic intelligence. After this scene he received three hearty recalls, and he thoroughly deserved them. It is a great pleasure to record the success of this sincere and painstaking singer.

The other members of the cast were the same as heretofore. With Mme. Eames as a lovely Juliet, and M. Plançon as Capulet there was plenty to delight the audience. M. Illy was the Mercutio, Mlle. Olitzka the Stephan, and Mlle. Bauermeister the Nurse. The orchestra, as before, treated the score kindly, and Signor Mancinelli conducted.

The performance of "Il Trovatore" last night enlisted the services of Mme. Nordica as Leonora, Mme. Mantelli as Azucena, Mr. Dippel as Manrico, Signor Campanari as the Count, and Mr. Pringle as Ferrando. As usual when "Il Trovatore" is given on a Saturday night, the upper part of the house was packed, and the applause had a tropical warmth in it. Most of it was evoked by the efforts of the two women singers and the baritone. Mme. Nordica lends to the hackneyed rôle of Leonora the benefits of her ripe dramatic experience. This has gone so far beyond parts of this type that she invests Leonora with an authority of dramatic bearing and a vocal reserve power generally missing from impersonations of Verdi's heroine.

Mme. Mantelli is thoroughly acquainted with the traditions of Azucena, and she sings and acts it in the true Italian fashion. Signor Campanari's Count di Luna is a well known impersonation. It is sufficient to say that although the baritone's voice sounded tired he acquitted himself with great credit and won the unfailing encore for "Il balen." Mr. Dippel was unfortunately not in good voice, otherwise his first appearance as Manrico might have been even more successful than it was. He had difficulty with his phrasing in the early part of the evening, but as his voice warmed up his work became better, and he sang "Ah, si ben mio" excellently. In the ensuing "Di quella pira" he sang the high notes, for which all "Il Trovatore" audiences wait, with splendid vigor and a fine quality of tone. He won an enthusiastic encore and doubled the allowance of high notes. The chorus sang out of tune a good deal of the time, but the orchestra was satisfactory. Signor Bevignani conducted.

MISS REHAN'S COMING TOUR.

Manager Dorney Doubts if Mme. Barrios Will Be in Her Company.

Richard Dorney, who will manage the contemplated tour of Miss Ada Rehan in this country, said yesterday that within the next few days her plans will be completed and made public. When asked if Mme. Algeria Barrios, widow of the one-time President of Guatemala, was to appear with Miss Rehan in her repertoire of plays this season under the management of Arthur Rehan, Mr. Dorney said:

"I do not think so. If Mr. Rehan has had any conversation with his sister regarding such plans I would certainly know something about it. Mr. Rehan, I understand, is to manage 'The Great Ruby,' opening in March at the Fourteenth Street Theatre, and probably Mme. Barrios will appear in this melodrama. I feel quite confident there is no truth whatever in the rumor that she will play second parts in Miss Rehan's list of plays."

J. K. Hackett in a New Play.

Arrangements have been completed by Daniel Frohman through which he will bring James K. Hackett and his new play, "The Pride of Jennico," to this city the middle of March either at the Knickerbocker or Lyceum Theatre for a long engagement. The play will be presented by Mr. Hackett in the meantime on tour, together with "Rupert of Hentzau."

"THE ONLY WAY" IN COURT.

Milwaukee Judge Refuses an Injunction Against Frohman.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., Dec. 30.—In the Superior Court to-day Judge Williams refused to grant an injunction restraining Henry Miller and the Charles Frohman company from producing the play entitled "The Only Way." Colgate Baker, a Milwaukee newspaper man, instituted the injunction proceedings, asking heavy damages and an accounting from Mr. Frohman as to receipts from the play. Baker claimed the production was an infringement on the name "The Only Way," which he claimed to have copyrighted.

Judge Williams declared there was lacking the element of competition in the plays of Charles Frohman and Mr. Baker, which bear the same title. They were as unlike as could be, and the property rights of the plaintiff were not invaded.

American Players Leave London.

LONDON, Dec. 30.—"The Belle of New York" closed to-night at the Shaftesbury Theatre. There had been 600 performances of the play, and the gross receipts had aggregated about £157,000. After the fall of the curtain the American members of the company presented to Manager Musgrove, on behalf of Mr. Lederer and "The Belle of New York" company, a silver punch-bowl, on which were inscribed the names of the principals, as a token of appreciation of his uniformly courteous treatment of the players.

Mrs. Langtry Sails for New York.

LIVERPOOL, Dec. 30.—The Cunard Line steamer Lucania, which sailed from here for New York to-day, took among her passengers Mrs. Langtry, the actress.

FATE OF AN OLD VIOLINIST.

Died Suddenly After Lodging-House Keeper's Cold Water Application.

Harry Brower, formerly a violinist of some merit, who sank from affluence to poverty, died early yesterday morning in his lodgings, at 12 Monteith Street, Brooklyn, under circumstances which caused Coroner Delap to order a thorough investigation. Brower was sixty-seven years old, and about twenty years ago he was well known, prosperous, and happy. He lived in his own home with his wife, to whom he was devoted. She died rather suddenly, and her death made a complete change in the musician's life. He cared for nothing, lost his money, and finally dropped out of sight.

Brower about a year ago appeared at the Monteith Street house, kept by Ignatz Kiefer, and engaged lodgings. His roommates were William Kane, Joseph Moeringer, and Frederick Schmitt. On Christmas day Brower began to complain of illness. He didn't improve, and on Friday night Kiefer advised him to go to a hospital. Brower refused, and said he believed that a small quantity of whisky would do him good. In a spirit of fun, so Kiefer told the police, he drenched Brower with cold water. Brower was seized with a chill and went to bed. Four hours later his roommates found him dead.

The police of the Hamburg Avenue Station were notified, and from other lodgers they learned of the cold water incident, and were told that the water had been thrown over the old musician with great deliberation and not in a spirit of fun. The police communicated this information to the Coroner, who at once directed Coroner's Physician Wuest to make an autopsy.

WINTER SHOWS HIS FACE.

Sudden Cold Makes the Great City Shiver and the Poor Suffer—No Skating Yet.

New York awoke yesterday to experience its first touch of real Winter weather. The day, so far, was the coldest of the year. The lowest temperature recorded was 8 degrees above zero, reached at 9 o'clock A. M. At 2 o'clock P. M. the thermometer registered 12 degrees, where it remained up to midnight. It was the coldest Dec. 30 since 1871, with the exception of that day in 1880 when the minimum reached was 5 degrees below zero.

The cold coming as it did, suddenly, caught many of the poor totally unprepared, and much suffering resulted in the tenements, and worse was the condition of those who depended upon the police stations for a night's lodging, or, failing in that, took refuge in some out-of-the-way place. From early yesterday morning Superintendent Blair of the Out-Door-Poor Department had more calls for relief than he could well attend to.

The City Lodging House on Friday night sheltered nearly 200 men and women, and yesterday many more applied for shelter and food.

A woman who gave her name as Annie Mackey was found lying on the sidewalk at East Twenty-fifth Street and First Avenue early yesterday morning nearly frozen to death. She said she had been discharged from the workhouse on Friday morning and had no place to go. She wandered about until she was exhausted, and then sat down on the sidewalk to sleep. The timely arrival of Policeman Buckley saved her life. Magistrate Mott sent her back to the Island for a month.

The management of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor has made an appeal for contributions. The society states that money is needed for fuel and food supplies, and asks for second-hand clothing for men, women, and children. All contributions of money and food or clothing may be sent to Robert Shaw Minturn of 105 East Twenty-second Street.

Superintendent William C. Yorke of the City Lodging House, 398 First Avenue, will be glad to receive contributions of cast-off clothing, which he will distribute among those persons relieved at the institution who need them most.

Though the cold was severe, a high wind prevented the frost from locking up the Park lakes sufficiently to encourage the hopes of skaters. In Central Park the lake still shows small patches of open water, and the ice is nowhere much thicker than an inch and one-half. It must be at least five inches thicker before skating will be permitted on it, and, according to the Park authorities, it will require five or six more days, if the present weather continues, to make it safe.

In the Bronx the indications for skating are more hopeful, as the ice on the river there is four inches thick.

It is expected that there will also be skating on the lake in Van Cortlandt Park in a few days, as the water is frozen to a depth of four inches.

Skating Season Opens in Brooklyn.

The present cold snap is filling the hearts of Brooklyn skaters with delight. Already there is skating on the big lake adjoining the reservoir on Ridgewood Heights, on the Steamer Pond, near the Willink entrance to Prospect Park, and on other smaller ponds in the suburbs. It is expected that the lakes in Prospect Park will be thrown open to skaters to-morrow.

COLD WEATHER IN THE STATE.

RHINECLIFF, Dec. 30.—The cold weather of the past forty-eight hours has completely closed navigation on the Upper Hudson. From here northward the river is shut tight with ice from two and a half to three inches thick, and it is fast. South of this place the ice is moving. The weather is very cold, with a strong northwest wind. At 6 o'clock P. M. the thermometer was at 8 degrees above, with the prospect of reaching the zero mark or below before morning.

WATERTOWN, Dec. 30.—With from four to six feet of snow on the level, Watertown and the surrounding country is now suffering with intense cold. This morning the mercury registered from 8 to 12 degrees below zero.

NYACK, Dec. 30.—The mercury in Nyack this morning is 6 degrees above zero. In the interior of the county it is 4 degrees below. The ponds are all frozen over and many skaters are out. Ice formed in the Hudson River last night.

MALONE, Dec. 30.—Northern New York is experiencing its first cold wave. The mercury dropped to zero early last night and to 10 below this morning.

GENEVA, N. Y., Dec. 30.—Zero weather prevails here, and considerable suffering is reported in the city and outlying districts. The mercury is steadily dropping, and a keen northwest wind is blowing. Very little snow has fallen.

SNOW IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Trains Are Delayed and Thousands of Cattle Exposed.

DAWSON, Indian Territory, Dec. 30.—The first snowstorm of the season began this morning. Trains are behind time and thousands of cattle are exposed to the storm.

CLAREMORE, Indian Territory, Dec. 30.—A heavy snow has been falling since early morning. It is over four inches deep and still snowing.

French Duty on American Wines.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—In order to correct a misapprehension as to the effect of the pending French reciprocity treaty upon wines, the State Department has authorized the statement that so far from injuriously affecting American wines, this treaty actually provides for a reduction of about 25 per cent. of duty on California wines imported into France. This has been obtained without any corresponding remission of duty imposed upon French wines imported into the United States.

Ice Blocks Ohio River Navigation.

CINCINNATI, Dec 30.—Navigation in the Ohio River from Cincinnati to Pittsburg is closed to-day by ice. The river between Portsmouth and Catlettsburg is full of ice, and as far down as Cincinnati the floating ice is so heavy as to make it dangerous for boats to meet, and impossible for them to land. Boats may venture down the river, but even that is uncertain to-day.

Florida Opposition to Free Trade.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., Dec. 30.—Many prominent tobacco and fruit growers from all sections of the State met in convention here to-day to enter a protest against the proposed legislation by Congress to remove all import duties from sugar, tobacco, and tropical fruits grown in Puerto Rico and Cuba.

Ohio Farmer Freezes to Death.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Dec. 30.—Henry F. Payson, a farmer, fifty years old, living near Port Clinton, east of here, was found frozen to death to-day in a wagon road between that place and Oak Harbor. He was driving home during the night, was overcome by the cold, and fell from his wagon and perished. The horses found their way home.

Cold Along the Hudson.

SING SING, N. Y., Dec. 30.—This is the coldest day of the season in this vicinity, and the mercury ranges from 5 above to nearly zero in some of the towns along the Hudson. The North River boats which continued to run had difficulty in getting through last night. Ice is forming rapidly in the Upper Hudson.

Eighteen Below Zero in Michigan.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Dec. 30.—Railroad offices here report the coldest weather of the Winter in the upper part of the lower peninsula. At Cadillac to-day the temperature was 15 below zero, at Reed City 18, and at Alba 18 below. Zero weather obtains all the way from Grand Rapids to the Straits of Mackinac.

Among the young guests were the Misses Lena Fanshawe, Marie de Neufville, Fanny Jones, Nelly Hard, Helen White Stevens, Lefferts, Wood, and Pratt, and Messrs. ***

Mrs. Everett M. Culver and Miss Katherine Clark, her sister, daughters of Senator W. A. Clark, and who are soon to leave New York to spend the Winter in Washington with their father, where he has leased a handsome residence, gave a large reception yesterday afternoon at their apartment, 175 West Fifty-eighth Street. There was a large attendance of guests, notwithstanding the intense cold of the afternoon.

Dr. Octavius A. White and Mrs. White gave last evening at their residence, 1,011 Madison Avenue, a cotillion for their granddaughter, Miss Alexandra H. Stevens, daughter of Mrs. Ledyard Stevens, and Miss Elizabeth Winthrop Stevens, daughter of Mrs. Berkeley Mostyn, misses of 12 and 14 respectively. The whole first floor of Dr. White's spacious residence was thrown together, and the decorations were profuse, consisting of festoons and wreaths of Christmas greens and holly on the walls, and ferns and palms scattered about the rooms. The cotillion was led by Mr. Lewis S. Morris and Miss Alexandra Stevens, while the little couple leading from the other end were Mr. Marshall C. Lefferts and Miss Elizabeth Winthrop Stevens. These little girls made a charming contrast, the one being a decided blonde, while the other is a pronounced brunette. The favors were tiny drums, pins, whistles, and other trifles, while the fourth figure was a confetti figure. A buffet supper was served in the billiard room down stairs, which was also beautifully decorated. As Mrs. White is much of an invalid, the little guests were received by Mrs. Berkeley Mostyn and Mrs. Ledyard Stevens, the latter wearing a gray moire gown with steel trimmings and mechlin lace, and ornaments of pearls and diamonds. Mrs. Mostyn was gowned in brown velvet with white lace, and wore sapphire and pearl ornaments. The affair began at 7 and ended about 10 o'clock. There were about ninety of the young people who had a jolly dance, just such an evening as Dr. White and Mrs. White in years gone by gave the fathers and mothers of these little people in their old mansion, 122 Second Avenue. Among the young guests were Clarinda Boardman, Alice Hasell, Beatrice Pratt, Edith Landon, Electra Havemeyer, Katharine Grinnell, Louisa Schroeder, Georgette Borland, Louise Jackson, Nan Atterbury, Gay Dexter, the Misses Hatch, Sylvia Parsons, Pauline Bouton, Anson Hard, Marshall C. Lefferts, John Van Buren Mitchell, Amos C. Schermerhorn, Maryan Wing, Howard Bretherton, Roderick Terry, Henry L. Burnett, Jr., Paul Chopin, Alfred Ely, M. Taylor Payne, Jr., George Wagstaff, Howland Auchincloss, Fairfield Osborn, and Dudley Cooper.

At the Saturday Junior Cotillion, better known as Mrs. Erhardt's class, danced at Delmonico's last evening, Prentice Kellogg and James MacLean led from opposite ends of the room, dancing alone. There were three favor figures, the favors being Japanese ferns, papier maché dogs, college flags, tin pipes, and horns. Mrs. Joel B. Erhardt, Mrs. Bacon, and Mrs. Trowbridge received the guests. The cotillion was a large one, there being many invited guests present, and the large ballroom was used. The affair began at 9 and ended at midnight. Among the members present were the Misses Cecil Boardman, Mildred Dix, Emily Grugan, Eleanor Swayne, Miss Erhardt, and the Misses Carpenter, Nash, Lillian Holmes, Ada Acosta, Ella Guthrie, Miss Fachiri, Burrell, Trowbridge, Elsie Ladd, Winifred Ives, Isabel Wilson Fowler, Ruth Emmons, Dollie Low, the Misses Bacon, Thornell, Smith, Cary, Eaton, Crane, Hastings, Stewart, Bloodgood, Raymond, and others, and the Messrs. Richard Acosta, Artemus Holmes, Boardman, Burroughs, Anson, Brown, Victor, Elliman, Stokes, Bull, Brokaw, Stone, Gruner, Kellogg, Du Bois, Fachiri, Burrell, Rhoades, Vanderpoel, Hastings, and others.

***

To-morrow evening Dr. Octavius A. White and Mrs. White will give at their residence, 1,011 Madison Avenue, a large cotillion for their granddaughter, Miss Helen White Stevens, and their grandson, Mr. Oscar Egerton Stevens, son and daughter of Mrs. Berkeley Mostyn. Miss Stevens is not yet out, and this dance is for her relatives and intimate friends only, those with whom she has been constantly associated since her early childhood. Next Winter, when Miss Stevens makes her début, Dr. White and Mrs. White will doubtless give some notable affairs for her. As Miss Stevens is a very popular girl, as well as a beauty, she has an unusually large circle of friends, and, therefore, the dance of to-morrow night will be a large one.

Announcement is made of the engagement of Miss Ophelia, daughter of Henry Meinhard, of 18 East Seventieth Street, to Albert Strauss of Birmingham, England.

MRS. ROOT AS AN ENTERTAINER.

Wife of the Secretary Is Popular in Washington.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—New York has been well represented in the past week, and promises to have a conspicuous place in the social annals of the season opening to-day. The Secretary of War and Mrs. Root gave their first formal entertainment on Tuesday evening in the form of a supper party in honor of Sir Henry Irving.

Mrs. Root has shown herself a clever as well as gracious hostess thus early, and in spite of her credited aversion of society promises to be popular alike with the official and resident sets. On Wednesday she gave a very pleasant afternoon reception, when she was assisted by Miss Miles, daughter of the General commanding the army; Miss Root, and Miss Mary Hopkins, the latter one of the cleverest and most attractive of this year's buds. Miss Root has already made friends with the leading spirits of the younger set, and has been a conspicuous assistant at the smartest débutante teas of the past month.

All the Cabinet officers will keep open house Monday, when, after the reception at the White House, Mrs. Root will have as her assistants Mrs. Sheridan, Mrs. Bates, Mrs. George B. McClellan, Mrs. Postlethwaite, Mrs. Cowles, and Mrs. Parsons, with from ten to twelve young women of resident and army circles.

On Tuesday Mrs. Root will be the hostess at a large dinner party for young people to be given by Gen. Corbin at the Chevy-Chase Club.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO

New York's Elaborate Washington Funeral Parade.

THE TAMMANY SOCIETY'S PART

Service in St. Paul's Followed by the Firing of Three Volleys in the Churchyard.

One Hundred years ago to-day New York City was in deep mourning for the death of George Washington. It was Washington's funeral day in this city, and a parade of an elaborate and novel character had been arranged by the municipal officials, in which every civil and military society took part. Near the end of the procession came a large bier, heavily draped with black, carrying a large funeral urn, over which hovered the figure of an eagle with drooping wings and bearing in its beak an emblem commemoratory of the death of Washington.

The last day of the year 1799 was Tuesday. All business was suspended, the flags floated at half mast from the shipping and public buildings, minute guns were fired from the old fort at the Battery, and badges of mourning were displayed on hundreds of houses. Columbia College granted a holiday to its students, and most of them obeyed the request of their President, William Samuel Johnson, to join in the memorial procession. The professors and Trustees set the example by appearing in line with the undergraduates.

Washington had been buried in his tomb at Mount Vernon on Dec. 18, but the news of his death was not published in this city until Dec. 19, and steps were at once taken to pay fitting honors to the memory of the country's first President and victorious Revolutionary General. Hence the delay in these memorial services. In Boston, where similar arrangements were made, the exercises were not held until the first week of the new year.

One of the interesting features of the New York parade was the prominent part taken by the Tammany Society. Notwithstanding Washington's criticisms at the time the society was formed, it had always held Washington in loyal remembrance, and its members had celebrated his birthday every year from 1790. The Tammany braves, decorated with their aboriginal emblems and badges of mourning, turned out in large numbers 100 years ago. They were led by their different Sachems, representing the thirteen original States. The tribal banners were covered with black, but that of the Virginia tribe, of which Washington had been elected an honorary member, was carried reversed. James Mooney, one of the leading organizers of Tammany, was Secretary at that time and also Father of the Council. He carried a magnificent pipe of peace as his badge of office, and all the members wore the customary buck's tail in their caps.

John Jacob Astor, whose mercantile house then occupied a portion of the site of the present Astor House, marched among the Masons as the Grand Treasurer, carrying a massive key. Gen. Alexander Hamilton was well in front of the line, coming just behind several light field pieces captured in the Revolutionary War. The members of the Cincinnati Society marched behind the bier, and among the pallbearers, who marched four on each side, were Richard Varick, Mayor of the city; Aquilla Giles, Gen. Ebenezer Stevens, Gen. Matthew Clarkson, Brockholst Livingston, and Col. Nicholas Fish.

After the parade had gone through the principal streets below City Hall Park, it disbanded at St. Paul's Church, where all those who could get in attended the memorial services.

Bishop Provost, rector of Trinity and the first Episcopal Bishop of New York, conducted the religious services and opened with prayer. Gouverneur Morris then delivered the oration on Washington, and it was widely published. The funeral urn was then carried from the bier into the churchyard, and three volleys were fired over it by the military corps.

Long accounts of the procession were published in the following day's papers, and the exercises were commented on in favorable terms in scores of out-of-town papers. The old Park Street Theatre, then new, had a special performance in the evening, and a monody on Washington was recited by one of the leading actors.

MASONS AT MEMORIAL SERVICES.

To Observe Anniversary of Washington's Funeral Exercises Here.

As to-day is the one hundredth anniversary of the public exercises held in this city on account of the death of George Washington Grand Master Wright D. Pownall of the State of New York has issued a circular to all the Masonic lodges under his jurisdiction suggesting that the fraternity commemorate the anniversary by the attendance of the members of the various lodges at divine services, at which the clergymen of the various denominations shall be requested to preach sermons on the life and character of Washington. It is expected that there will be a general compliance with the suggestion. There will be no Masonic ceremonies, but where such services are held the members will attend in a body and will wear the regalia of the order.

There will be several services in this city. The Grand Lodge service will be held at St. Andrew's Protestant Episcopal Church, Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Street, at 11 A. M. The Rev. Dr. George R. Van De Water, Grand Chaplain of the State of New York, will preach the sermon. The lodges of the Fourth District will unite in a service in the Grand Lodge room at the Masonic Temple at 3 P. M., and those of the Sixth and Seventh Districts will assemble at St. Paul's Chapel at the same hour. Centennial Lodge, No. 763, will attend services at 11 A. M. at Temple Emanu-El, at which the Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman, Chaplain of the lodge, will deliver the sermon. Franklin Lodge, No. 216, will listen to a sermon by the Rev. A. E. Barrett at 7:45 P. M. at Washington Heights Methodist Episcopal Church, Amsterdam Avenue and One Hundred and Fifty-third Street.

In the First Reformed Church, (Dutch,) Bedford Avenue and Clymer Street, Brooklyn, at 7:30 o'clock this evening, the Rev. Howard Wilbur Ennis, pastor, will deliver a special address on the life of Washington. The twenty-three lodges of the Second Masonic District will attend this service. They will meet at their respective headquarters at 7 o'clock and proceed in a body to the church.

THE CARE OF BIRDS.

Woman Who Understands Them Tells of Some Often Made Mistakes.

The most popular woman in town this past week has been a woman who knows more about birds than most people ever dreamed could be known, and who has been in the bird department of a big uptown store. If there is one thing the members of the human race love to do it is to get a prescription free. That is what this particular woman has been giving this past week for birds, and every one in town who has a bird, has had a bird, or is thinking of getting a bird, has been to see her. Her words are at a premium, and it is like a woman doctor at a woman's club when there has been a general invitation after the address to ask questions.

"It is a strange thing," said the woman when she stopped to sit down a minute and so, being lost to sight, had a few minutes to herself, "but people seem to think that canaries suffer from being in cages. It is a mistake. They have never known anything else, and they are perfectly happy. A woman came in here only to-day and remarked:

"'Poor little things; shut up tight, without a breath of air!'

"Well, I'll admit that perhaps we don't any of us have quite as much oxygen as we ought to have, with the Christmas crowds around, but the birds are in these little open cages, and they have as much air as we have. The trouble is very often that birds are given too much air. They are brought up in the houses of the peasants in the Hartz Mountains. They raise them in the houses, make by hand the little cages in which they are shipped to this country, and neither the birds nor their ancestors for a long time back have known anything else.

"One woman said to me the other day that her birds had not been singing for some months, and she thought she would simply open the cages some day and let them fly away. Poor little things, they would not live twenty-four hours if they were let out, Summer or Winter. I begged her if she was tired of them not to turn them adrift like that, but to give them to some one who was fond of them.

"The great trouble in keeping birds is draughts, which are almost sure to kill them. When birds were first put into the big department stores nearly half of them were lost, but now we have them put in a sheltered place, and probably very few are lost in a season.

"I feel so sorry for the poor little birds that I see hanging outdoors. People think that it will do them no harm on a warm day, and they put them out, and they have company come in and stay to dinner, and they are engaged in the evening, and by the time they are in bed they remember that they have left the bird out, and by that time it has taken a bad cold. I see them hanging out when I go by in cars and feel like stopping to take them in. Extreme heat is almost as bad, and in small apartments where birds are hung in kitchens which are close, hot, and steamy, they are sure to acquire some disease.

"There are very few people who know anything about birds. There was one nice little woman in Boston who really did understand them. She died recently, seventy-two years old, and she had been keeping a birds' boarding house for forty-two years. She had one of the oldest parrots known—ninety years old. Sometimes she had as many as 300 birds. They were sent to her from all parts of the country, some of them to be boarded simply and others to be treated. She used to give them regular medicines and cured many of them.

"'There is a great increase in the demand for birds. Last year different dealers in this country imported 150,000, and last July and August it was almost impossible to find one. This year we shall have at least 25,000 more imported, I believe. We have been receiving more birds than any other country, but on the Continent they seem to be following our example, and have diverted some of our supplies.

"There is all the difference in the world in canaries and in their notes. Different people like different qualities of tone, but the majority of people like to be advised. Frequently they take advice of any one who happens to be standing around when they purchase the bird. Some one will say:

"'That's a good bird.'

"'Yes, it has very sweet notes,' some one else will say, and the purchaser will decide immediately upon that bird, which may not be one of the best by any means. You want to hear a bird a number of times before you can decide how it can sing, and it may take two or three efforts before it will really give out its notes freely. A friend of mind has a bird which has a certain pretty little song that she likes very much, but you may have to listen some time before you hear it.

"When I am going around among the birds and I hear one that has a sweet note I go to it and make a single mark on the cage. Then I come around some time later when the bird is singing again, and if I still like it I put a second mark on the cage. Then when I hear it a third time I put a third mark on if I am satisfied, and then if any one comes in and asks my advice about a bird I have one that I can recommend.

"There is as much difference in the dispositions of birds as there is in people. Now we have had a pair of birds here that I have been very much interested in. They were put in the cage together, and they immediately made friends instead of quarreling. They sat on the perches together. If one went to the seed dish the other would follow, and then they would both go to the water dish. If one sat in the swing and the other on the perch they touched bills and kissed each other. I don't stay in one place long enough to keep birds, but if I did I should want a bird that would let me love it. I had one canary that lived for twenty-one years.

"Canaries can learn to do many cunning tricks. When I have one I take it in my hand every day for a few minutes. Then I open the cage door, put a little bit of something green on my hand, and the bird hops out on it. He is accustomed to the hand and is not afraid. After that he can learn to do many tricks. I know one man who has a canary which will never eat hemp seed because it has been taught not to. The man will put two or three of the seeds in the seed dish, stand by the cage and say: 'Master is hungry; he wants to be fed.' He will open the cage door; the bird will fly out on his finger; take a hemp seed from the dish, crack it with his bill, and then lay it on his master's tongue.

"Java sparrows are very attractive little birds. There was one in one of the stores that seemed to take a fancy to me. It would twitter whenever I went near the cage and stop when I went away. If I held it near my face it would twitch my ear in play. I decided that I must have it, but while I went to see about getting it some one had sold it. The man was just ready to take it. He offered to give it up if I wanted it so much, but I could only have kept it a few months, and I was glad to have it find a good home. That was in Brooklyn, and some time after there was a fire in the apartment house where the purchaser of the bird lived. He escaped with his wife and then remembered the bird, and they had become so attached to it that he went back and rescued it at considerable risk.

"One thing I never do is to hang a bird high. If the cage is high you cannot see into it without climbing on a chair, and you don't realize when anything is needed. Some people say their birds will not sing while they are mating. My birds will sing. I take good care of them, pet them, and never let strangers in to disturb them. From August to November they are moulting and require special care and a change of diet. A little lettuce, apple, plantain, a little sweet orange and hard-boiled egg, with a little pepper are some of the things they may have. They should never have hemp seed, which is too fattening."

Ex-Employes Sue for Damages.

TERRE HAUTE, Ind., Dec. 30.—Suits aggregating $30,000 have been entered against the Havens & Geddes Company by ex-employes, who were injured in the great fire which started in the firm's store on Dec. 19, 1898, and which destroyed over $1,000,000 worth of property. Only five of the ex-employes have as yet filed their suits, and it is said that as soon as the relatives and guardians of those who lost their lives in the flames take action the claims will foot up to $100,000.

Hardware Prices Are Advanced.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Dec. 30.—Hardware dealers all over the South to-day received telegrams from the American Steel and Wire Company's Chicago office advancing prices of nails and wire 25 cents per 100 pounds, effective to-day. All kinds of hardware were advanced 11 per cent. The advance is said to be due to the advance in iron and steel.

Wife He Thought Dead Lives.

Special to The New York Times.

POUGHKEEPSIE, Dec. 30.—Samuel Wald, formerly a prominent merchant of Albany, cried with joy to-day, when he came here after an absence of several months in the West, and found that his wife, thought by him to be dead, was alive and well in Pittsfield. The first train through took him to her.

IN THE NEW YEAR'S HONOR

Celebrations Arranged in the City for To-day and To-morrow.

Chimes to Ring Out a Welcome to 1900—Watch-Night Services.—Receptions and a Ball.

The arrival of the new year will be celebrated in many ways throughout the city to-day and to-morrow. Many of the Roman Catholic churches will take advantage to-night of the Papal permission for the celebration of midnight mass. At St. Patrick's Cathedral a pontifical mass will be celebrated by Archbishop Corrigan, and Father Lavelle, rector of the cathedral, will preach the sermon. Two choirs and a full orchestra will furnish the music. Admission will be by ticket only. At St. Stephen's Church the celebrant will be the Right Rev. Sbarretti, the new Bishop of Havana. The rector, the Rev. Charles H. Colton, will preach. Midnight mass will also be celebrated at the Church of St. Paul the Apostle and at other Roman Catholic churches.

Among the Methodist Episcopal churches the customary watch-night services will be observed, beginning in most instances later than the usual evening services, and continuing until shortly after midnight. Silent prayer will mark the passage of the old year and the advent of the new. At St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church the sacrament of the Lord's Supper will be administered as the closing service. At St. James's Church, Buck's cantata, "The Coming of the King," will be sung, and the Lord's Supper will be administered. At the Church of the Saviour, beginning at 10 P. M., there will be holy communion, baptism, reception of new members, and a praise service.

Watch-night services will also be observed by a number of Protestant Episcopal churches, including St. George's and the Church of the Ascension. At St. Clement's Church there will be a celebration of the holy communion at midnight. At many Presbyterian churches, also, midnight services will be held.

According to time-honored custom, the chimes of Trinity, Grace, and St. Andrew's Episcopal Churches will ring a welcome to the new year. At Trinity Church the following programme will be played on the chimes by Albert Meislahn, beginning at 11:30 P. M.:

Concerto in Ronco, by D. T. Hodges, 1857; "Sunday Evening Bells," "Hark, a Burst of Heavenly Music," Luther's Judgment Hymn, "Duke Street," "Hundred," "Kiss Me, Mother; Good-Night," "Parting Song," "Come, Welcome the New Year," "Centennial march, "The Old Volunteer Fireman," Scotch melody, from "Guy Mannering," "Fille du Regiment," "America," "Yankee Doodle," "Auld Lang Syne," "Home, Sweet Home."

The chimes of Grace Church will ring out the following programme played by Miss Bertha Thomas:

"Grandsire Triple Changes," "The Heavens Are Telling," Sonata VI., Mozart; "Long, Long Ago," "Angels ever Bright and Fair," "Jesus, Joy of Man's Desiring," "March of the Men of Harlech," "The Old Oaken Bucket"; aria, anon.; chorus, "Mansaniello," Auber; "Ring Out, Wild Bells," Patton; "Joy to the World," Handel; Scotch melody; "The Forest," Mozart; "Auld Lang Syne," "Praise God, from Whom all Blessings Flow."

J. Grant Senia will play the following programme on the Seguin Chimes at St. Andrew's Church, beginning at 11:45 P. M.

Seguin Chime Changes, "Across the Sky the Shades of Night," "Lead, Kindly Light," "The Day is Gently Sinking to a Close," "Abide With Me," "Praise God, from Whom all Blessings Flow," "Red, White, and Blue," "See, the Conquering Hero Comes," "Unfurl the Banner," "Hail, Columbia," "Suwanee River," "Blue Bells of Scotland," "America," "Coming Thro' the Rye," "The Starry Flag," "Home, Sweet Home."

Special New Year's services have been arranged for this afternoon at the various branches of the Young Men's Christian Association, and New Year's receptions will be held to-morrow afternoon. At the West Side Auditorium, in West Fifty-seventh Street, this afternoon, Edward J. Wessels, editor of The Great Round World, will address the association on "The World's Great Events During 1899." The Harlem Branch will keep open house to-morrow. At the afternoon reception for men, among other entertainments, an exhibition of wireless telegraphy will be given. In the evening The Weber Male Quartet Company will entertain the members and their guests. The Central Branch of the association, in Brooklyn, will give a reception to the young men of that borough from 4 to 6 o'clock to-morrow afternoon. Rear Admiral Philip and Col. Clayton of the Fourteenth Regiment, N. G., S. N. Y., will be present.

The People's Institute will give a New Year's Eve concert at Cooper Union to-night under the direction of W. Hubert Arnold. The Rev. Dr. R. Heber Newton will address the meeting. At the Bowery Mission and Young Men's Home a watch service will be held, beginning at 7:45 P. M. The service will close at midnight, when lunch will be served to homeless men.

The Associated Cycling Clubs of the city will celebrate the advent of the new year by their annual "first run," which will start at one minute past midnight from Columbus Circle. Headquarters have been established for to-night at the Circle House. Prizes have been offered by the proprietors of the Getty House, Yonkers, and Florence Hotel, Tarrytown, and the Gerbereux trophy will again be competed for. The Madison Wheelmen will open their new clubhouse, at 1,666 Madison Avenue, to-night with a housewarming.

The Republican Union of the Twenty-eighth Assembly District will give its annual watch-night entertainment at the clubhouse, 216 East Eighty-third Street, between the hours of 11 and 1 to-night. The New Year's punch will be brewed by Julius S. Louferty. At the Ludlow Street Jail Sheriff-elect Grell will entertain his friends to-morrow, and several of the new Municipal Court Justices will hold New Year's receptions at their courtrooms.

The new year will be ushered in with music and gayety to-night at Madison Square Garden by the Hungarian Literary Society with its annual Peasant Ball. The interior of the Garden has been transformed into a Hungarian village, its quaint old buildings faithfully reproduced. Among the features of the entertainment will be a recruiting scene from the revolutionary days of 1848. In this scene a cavalcade of Hungarian Hussars will appear, a hundred girls in the national Magyar costume will sing and dance, and the ceremony of consecrating the flag of the newly recruited regiment will be reproduced. The ball will follow this entertainment. Music will be furnished by Victor Herbert's Twenty-second Regiment Band, Nahan Franko's Orchestra, and the Red Hussar Gypsy Band.

NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

Train Breaks Wagon into Splinters—Driver and Horse Unhurt.

BURLINGTON, N. J., Dec. 30.—Joseph Richardson of this city, who is known by all the children of Burlington because of his resemblance to the generally accepted notion of Kris Kringle, had a remarkable escape from death last night. He attempted to cross the tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad in a wagon ahead of a rapidly approaching freight train.

The engine struck the wagon, breaking it into splinters and throwing Richardson in the air. Richardson arose unassisted, walked over to where his horse was lying, took it by the bridle, spoke to it, and it, too, arose. Neither had received a scratch.

Alleged Brooklyn Boys Break Jail.

MALONE, N. Y., Dec. 30.—Two boys, who claimed to be Philip and Joseph Nesser of Brooklyn, came up in the Adirondacks last week with guns and equipments to hunt and trap during the Winter. The hunting was poor, and for lack of other excitement they set fire to three vacant farmhouses, for which they were arrested and brought to Malone and locked up. Friday night they broke jail by digging a hole through the steel ceiling. Joseph was recaptured, but the other boy is still at large, and is supposed to have gone south toward Utica.

Telephone Company Incorporated.

ALBANY, Dec. 30.—The Rensselaer Telephone and Telegraph Company was incorporated to-day, with a capital of $150,000. The company intends to operate lines in the Cities of Troy, Rensselaer, Cohoes, Watervliet, and Schenectady, and the villages of Bath, Waterford, Lansingburg, and Green Island. The directors are John H. Gleason, Edward F. Murray, John J. Smith, E. E. Summy, and Charles Mahoney of Troy.

Yerkes on Wealth and Happiness.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—"The accumulation of great wealth does not produce happiness," was a remark made to-day before the Commercial Teachers' Federation in the course of an address by Charles T. Yerkes, the street railway millionaire. Mr. Yerkes pointed out the folly of thrusting upon the world a young man learned in Latin, but profoundly ignorant of practical business methods.

BIG TRUST ESTATE DECISION.

Union Company's Liability as Trustee of Edmund Waring's Property—His Survival Caused Complications.

Justice Bookstaver, in the Supreme Court, yesterday, issued a decree directing the Union Trust Company, as trustee of the estate of the late Edmund Waring, to pay over to his grandchildren $130,446.25, which represents $72,875 originally transferred by Mr. Waring, with 6 per cent. interest from Oct. 27, 1886.

Mr. Waring in 1881 transferred the above sum to his son William by a trust deed, William agreeing to pay his father $4,500 a year. Upon Edmund Waring's death the principal and any accrued income were to be divided between William and his married sister, Mrs. Catherine E. Secor.

William Waring died in 1885, and his widow, Mrs. Frederick Waring, kept all the bonds and stocks belonging to his father's transferred property. This action on her part led to litigation. The Union Trust Company, which had become the substituted trustee in place of William Waring, brought suit against the widow, and obtained a judgment in replevin against her for $72,875. This sum she subsequently paid to the company.

Thereupon the Union Trust Company, Mrs. Secor, and Mrs. Waring entered into an agreement, whereby the trust fund was divided up among them, Mrs. Secor and Mrs. Waring getting most of it. Edmund Waring made no objection to this distribution.

Mrs. Secor died in 1887. Edmund Waring survived until 1891. Thus the unusual spectacle was presented of a man who had provided for the distribution of his property after his death between his two children surviving both of them. The transfer paper made no provision for this contingency.

According to the section of the Revised Statutes relating to uses and trusts, a trustee, even with the consent of the beneficiaries, cannot wipe out the trust. But this, it is claimed, was done by the Union Trust Company, when, by agreement with Mrs. Secor and Mrs. Waring, the division of the property was put into operation. It was alleged, therefore, that the company was still answerable for the money.

Upon the death of Mrs. Secor the property reverted to Edmund Waring, and when he died Fernando Baltis, ex-President of the Mechanics and Traders' Bank, as his executor, employed the law firm of Leventritt & Brennan to bring action against the Union Trust Company to recover the original amount and 6 per cent. interest from Oct. 27, 1886. The firm of Miller, Peckham & Dixon appeared as attorneys for the Union Trust Company. After eight weeks' litigation Justice Bookstaver has rendered his opinion in favor of Executor Baltis. The case, it is said, will be appealed. The Statute of Limitations protects Mrs. Waring from any legal liability, but the Union Trust Company, it is alleged, will have to make good the whole amount. Seven grandchildren of Edmund Waring will profit by the decision if it is upheld on appeal.

THE UNDERWRITERS' AGENCY.

Charge of Grand Larceny Made by W. S. Mitchell Taken Up.

Magistrate Hogan in the Centre Street Police Court yesterday began an investigation into the charge of grand larceny made by William S. Mitchell, Treasurer of the Beacon Motor Traction Company of Boston against the American Underwriters' Agency of 52 Broadway.

According to the statements made by Mitchell in a private examination by Magistrate Hogan, he came to New York in August for the purpose of floating $1,000,000 worth of bonds here. The American Underwriters' Agency agreed to float the bonds but demanded a deposit of $5,000 as a guarantee. This was paid, but when the contract fell through, a little later, on account of a dispute, the Underwriters' Agency refused to pay it back again.

Mr. Mitchell was the only witness heard so far, but it is said that several will appear for both sides. The case was adjourned until next Thursday afternoon.

TO OBSERVE THE SUN'S ECLIPSE.

Americans Will Start for North Africa Next Month.

AMHERST, Mass., Dec. 30.—Percival Powell of Boston and Prof. David P. Todd of Amherst College will start for England early next month to observe the total eclipse of the sun May 28, in Northern Africa. They first will make a tour of the important European observatories, collecting notes on new forms of instruments, processes, and latest methods of astronomical work.

Their principal instrument for observing the eclipse will be a 24-inch telescope for obtaining large scale pictures of the sun's corona. The expedition will return in June.

FORGER SENT TO PRISON.

Robert J. Knox Sentenced to Four and a Half Years at Pittsburg.

PITTSBURG, Dec. 30.—Robert J. Knox, alias J. B. Bennett, who was arrested in New York recently as a member of a gang of swindlers operating in various parts of the country, was sentenced to four years and a half to the Riverside Penitentiary to-day by Judge White. Knox was convicted of forgery on two counts. He was also fined $500 on each indictment.

Knox is a brother of a prominent Presbyterian preacher, and a nephew of John Jay Knox, ex-Controller of the Treasury. Another uncle is President of the German Theological Seminary of Bloomfield, N. J., and a third is a leading business man of St. Paul.

PENSION AGENT IN TROUBLE.

MINNEAPOLIS, Dec. 30.—D. H. Alexander, special examiner of the Pension Bureau, has seized about 500 pension certificates and vouchers from the office of Robert B. Hostetler, a local pension attorney, because they were, it is alleged, being illegally executed.

The vouchers cannot legally be filled out until Jan. 4, when the next quarterly payment is due, nor can they be filled out by any one but the pensioner himself. Just to what degree there has been irregularity in executing the vouchers does not yet appear, as Examiner Alexander declines to discuss the matter, and will only explain to inquiring pensioners that the seizure is due to violations of the law which must be investigated.

Mr. Hostetler maintains that while some of the vouchers were signed, none of them had been sworn to, and therefore had not been legally executed. There was therefore no violation of the law in his view of the case. The signing in advance was merely to save time.

INDIANS SELL CHICAGO LANDS.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—Samuel M. Biddison, President of the State Mutual Life Insurance Company of Illinois, and Edwin Stark have purchased from the Pottawatomie Indians a quit claim deed to a strip of land situated along the lake shore of Chicago from Rush Street Bridge south to the Indiana State line. They claim the title never was purchased from the Indians by the Government, and that the territory lies outside of the boundaries of the State of Illinois.

Included in the tract are lands owned by the Illinois Central Railroad, the Lake Front Park, Chicago Beach Hotel, a strip along the lake side of Jackson Park, lands of the Illinois Steel Company, and all other property touching the lake south of the river. The strip is from two to six blocks wide.

Messrs. Biddison and Stark transacted their business with Wessan Molay, principal chief of the tribe, and a committee composed of Thomas Topash, Joseph Molay, Andrew Rapp, Neo Basil, and Charles Person, acting for the Pottawatomies. The price paid for the quit claim deed to the strip was $35,000, to be paid over to the Indians when their title is approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Eye Knocked Out by Hockey Ball.

MOUNT HOLLY, N. J., Dec. 30.—Hobart Hankins, nine years of age, of Pemberton, lost his left eye in a peculiar accident today. With some companions he went skating on a pond, and they decided to play hockey. One of the players hit the wooden ball a terrific blow, and it struck young Hankins in the eye, knocking it out of his head.

Obedience to Civil Service Law.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The Civil Service Commission, in its annual report to be issued next week, will say that the civil service law is being more generally conformed to than ever before. It shows that the removals of employes, based upon its statistics for this year, now average slightly less than 2 per cent. of the whole number of classified places.

WOMAN LANDSCAPE GARDENER.

Miss Beatrix Jones Has Attained Her Eminence in the Profession by Hard Study and by Travel.

The work of Miss Beatrix Jones as a landscape gardener is interesting. The daughter of Mrs. Cadwalader Jones of New York, she belongs in a social circle from which the workers of the world do not so often come, because there is not the incentive of necessity, which has so much to do with many accomplishments. This is especially so with women, and Miss Jones's work is particularly noteworthy because it is the result of an inborn talent which has been developed by hard study, and which has brought her to the top of her profession. Many things have been said about her work from time to time, some of them true, and many of them not.

To begin at the beginning of the story, she began to show when a very small girl a decided fondness for the great world of outdoors and nature in all forms. She had an excellent chance to study it at the Summer home of the family at Bar Harbor. She was interested in everything about the place, and if a tree were to be moved she was always an interested spectator. Her fondness for these things began to bear the nature of a talent, and it was developed for the same reason and in the same way that a talent for music would have been if she had shown a particular aptitude for that art. Her reading was directed along the line of nature studies, and it was in that way that she began her studies without knowing it.

It was at rather a fortunate time, when there was a revolt from the chromo period of the country, and the landscape gardener was developing from a retired gardener, sufficiently well to do to engage his own laborers and to lay out diamond coleus beds and Persian carpets of foliage plants, into a clever artist. Prof. Charles S. Sargent of Harvard, the authority upon trees, who is now writing a large work upon the trees of North America, is a friend of the family. He became interested in Miss Jones's studies, directed her course of reading, and advised that it become thorough—that if she was going to do any studying along this line it would be well to do it systematically. Miss Jones was a very young girl when she began her reading, which covered a wide field and led her later to take a course of study at the Arnold Arboretum.

England is noted for the development of outdoor work, and has schools where it is taught—schools of forestry and of market gardening—but there is no school of landscape gardening. That has to be learned from observation and the study of the gardens of the world. That was Miss Jones's next course. She went abroad and visited the famous gardens of Great Britain, Germany, France, and Italy. Great Britain she found a great country of gardens. In England every woman is a gardener on a small scale, is devoted to her flowers, and not only such gardens as those of Chatsworth and Blenheim are beautiful, but the smaller ones, which represent not only the care of experienced gardeners, but the personal affection of the owners.

There were the wonderful parks of Germany—Munich and Berlin—and the old romantic gardens of France and Italy. There were some 150, more or less, that Miss Jones visited. As far as she could she previously studied the past history of the gardens she visited. Then she compared the present with the past, and took many photographs for reference.

It is probable that Miss Jones is the only woman in the world who has ever so carefully prepared herself for the work of landscape gardening. There are women in England who lay out small parks and take charge of estates, but it is doubtful if there are any who are so thoroughly fitted for the profession.

Landscape gardening, like architecture, includes many professions in one. There is surveying, a thorough understanding of drainage, roadmaking, the putting up of the smaller buildings on an estate, the Summer houses, boat houses, and the fountains; a general knowledge of architectural effects to suit the style of the grounds to the house; a knowledge of trees, shrubs, and plants, their seasons for blooming, and the effects of climate and soil, and what these are in different parts of the country. A garden to be laid out in Maine is very different from a garden laid out in Washington, D. C. And all this is aside from the purely business part of the work. Sometimes, when Miss Jones has taken the contract for a whole work, she has from eighty to a hundred men working under her. She directs their work, and she sees that they are paid.

She had been reading for four or five years before she went abroad, and she was well prepared, when she returned, to undertake real work. Prof. Sargent had said: "No one will be willing to accept your services for work of this kind without paying for them. If they pay for them the best professional work should be given." It has been said that Miss Jones has made bids for work, but that is not so. All her work has come to her unsolicited. On her return to this country after her trip abroad a friend proposed that she undertake the clearing and drainage of his land. This she did, and the rest of her work has followed. She has done much work in Bar Harbor, some at Tuxedo, some at White Plains, and in the vicinity of Philadelphia and Washington. Sometimes she is sent for merely to give a professional opinion.

Usually before the work is begun an estimate is given and a plan is made and submitted to the owner, and if there is a new house going up the architect, owner, and landscape gardener consult together to bring about a result that will be entirely satisfactory, and the house is located where it will make the best effect in the grounds, and where it can be most easily and satisfactorily reached by the driveways. It is the perfection of good work when the gardener and the architect work in unison.

When work is begun the first thing to do is to have a survey made of the grounds. This is done by a professional. The surveying gives the grades on the estate, so that there is no danger, as there might be in work by the eye alone, of trying to make water run up hill or of leaving stagnant places where the land is not thoroughly drained. The rest of the work goes on according to the location and the various conditions of climate and natural conditions. The aim is to make the most of the natural conditions and to improve them according to natural laws. There is nothing incongruous put into a garden by a cultivated landscape gardener—nothing that would not be put on to a canvas by a clever painter in making a good picture. The days are past when it is considered a triumph of art to put a brilliant tropical shrub with a northern evergreen tree for a background. It is not true to nature. The artist gardener and the artist in paints have the same talent, the ability to see the truth in nature and to reproduce it.

One of Miss Jones's recent achievements has been the estate of Edgar Scott, son of the late Thomas A. Scott, at Bar Harbor, where she drained a swamp covered with growth of birch and alder and made the place at once sanitary and beautiful. There was a consultation between Wadsworth Longfellow, the architect, the gardener, and the owner. Miss Jones's own home at Bar Harbor is charming, the grounds running down to the water's edge, and the gardens filled with perennial flowers. There was a terrace put on the estate of Mr. Garrison at Tuxedo, and there is a formal garden to be made for Mr. Percival Chubb at his Summer home on Long Island. The work is made up entirely of large undertakings. In some places there are old gardens which the owners feel can be improved. Old places are purchased, and the grounds do not suit the new proprietors. Some of the smaller pieces of work are quite as interesting as the large. One interesting piece of work was the laying out of a plot of land on the outskirts of Greenwich, Conn. The town is gradually growing up to the land, and when it overspreads it it will not be after the fashion of the cow pastures of Boston or a New England mill village, for the whole large plot is properly laid out according to the latest and best ideas of road architecture and landscape effect.

The Spring and Fall are the busy seasons of the year, when the planting is in order. When the ground is frozen hard no real work can be done, but then plans can be made and grounds inspected ready for future work. It is hard work and requires a good physique and strong constitution. Besides that, real love for the work and an immense amount of perseverance and patience are needed. It is not work that can be taken up at short notice and carried on for a short time as a stop gap. For the woman who likes it and has a talent for it, it is inspiring, but in unpleasant weather and walking around a big estate in the rain, taking notes without an umbrella, following workmen here and there, it would be unendurable to any one else. Two or three pieces of work are carried on together as much as possible, and a bicycle can be used in going from one to the other, but there is always a great deal of walking and standing around that is tiring.

There is some feeling of surprise at first among workingmen who find that a young woman is to direct their work. But tact, courtesy, firmness, and good business ability are as quickly recognized in a woman as in a man.

Miss Jones now occupies the whole of one floor of the family residence, on Eleventh Street, one of the large houses of the older residence parts of the city, for her office and library. She is constantly accumulating books in a line with her work, and keeps in touch with everything new that is going on in landscape gardening. In her workrooms are many photographs of the gateways, fountains, and parts of famous gardens of the Old World, which she took herself while abroad. She is in frequent communication with different parts of the continent, receives catalogues, and imports bulbs from Holland, other things from England and France, and even terra cotta pieces for fountains from Italy.

DIED AT SEA ON THE ST. LOUIS.

The American liner St. Louis, which arrived yesterday, reported having had a mild voyage. On Wednesday the steamer passed through a blanket of fog, and on Friday afternoon there was a cold, western breeze that brought along some snow.

Among the passengers on board were Mrs. Eric Barrington, Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Branch, Bishop Hornby of the English Church, and Adrian Islin, Jr.

Miss Dora Morell of New York, who was returning from Europe in company with her sister, Miss Ada Morell, died on Wednesday of pneumonia. Her body was brought home.

One of the first-cabin women passengers slipped on the deck on Tuesday and received painful injuries. She was taken from the ship after the other passengers had landed, but declined to give her name.

Christmas Day was celebrated with a grand dinner. The saloon was wreathed with evergreens and mistletoe.

MONEY ORDERS TO MEXICO.

The new general order received by all the Post Offices in the United States from Assistant Postmaster General Perry S. Heath in relation to the schedule of fees charged for the issuance of international money orders and the exchange for money orders established between this country and the Republic of Mexico will go into effect next Tuesday. The order provides for three different schedules of fees on international money orders—first, the domestic fees for orders payable in Cuba and Puerto Rico; second, the regular international fees as published in the postal laws and regulations, and, third, the new intermediate special rate for money orders issued in the United States and payable in Mexico.

The first two schedules have been in operation for some time, but the third is new, and the work of the convention held last September to arrange for a direct exchange of international postal money orders with the Republic of Mexico. The fees it provides for United States money orders payable in any of the twenty-seven territories of Mexico, range from 5 cents for amounts of $10 or less to 50 cents for amounts of $100, which is the largest sum for which a money order can be made payable.

The exchange station for the United States has been placed at Laredo, Texas, while the Mexican station will be at Nuevo Laredo, in Mexico. The orders drawn in the United States and in Mexico must be expressed in the money of the countries where they are issued. They will all go to the exchange offices of their respective countries, where they will be reissued with the amount of money they represent written in the denomination of the country in which they are payable. A daily exchange will take place between the offices at Laredo and Nuevo Laredo, in which all the orders received during the day will be transferred.

BECAUSE SH LOVED HIM SO.

FOR NEW RIDING ACADEMY

Building to Cost $500,000 Will Soon Be Erected.

PROMINENT MEN INTERESTED

The Site Extends from Sixty-sixth to Sixty-seventh Street on Central Park West.

Equestrians in New York are to have within a year the largest and most thoroughly equipped riding academy in the world, for they will be housed in a building that is to cost half a million dollars, and the appointments throughout are to be in keeping with the lavish expenditure in erecting the building. The indoor riding ring will be larger than the arena of Madison Square Garden That is 200 by 80 feet, while the proposed tanbark ring will be 200 by 100 feet.

The site for the new building includes twelve lots on Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh Streets, just west of Central Park West, and plans for erecting the new home of the equestrians were filed yesterday with the Department of Buildings.

The men behind the enterprise are all patrons of Durland's Riding Academy, Fifty-ninth Street and the Boulevard, and they include some of the prominent men in financial and social circles in the city. The Building and Financial Committee consists of J. A. McCall, Park Commissioner George C. Clausen, Frank Jay Gould, Thomas Carmichael, ex-Mayor Hugh J. Grant, Thomas J. Ryan, R. H. Halsted, J. R. Hegeman, and William Durland.

The academy at Fifty-ninth Street has during the past few years been found to be too small to meet the demands of the riders, and not long since a committee of equestrians proposed to Mr. Durland that he organize a new company and get subscriptions for the undertaking from his patrons. He accepted the suggestion, and a new company was formed with ninety of the academy's patrons as the subscribers. The new site was selected recently, and the lots purchased, and ground for the new building, which has been designed by Henry F. Kilburn, will be broken early next week.

According to the plans, the building will be strikingly original in its details. It will consist properly of three buildings, the central one of which will run from Sixty-sixth to Sixty-seventh Street. This building will hold the big tanbark ring, 200 feet long and 100 feet wide, and along the entire length of one side will run a promenade from which the show in the ring may be watched and which will also serve as a mounting block for the riders. An elliptical gallery overlooking the ring will be arranged to seat 1,500 spectators, and on special occasions this seating capacity can be arranged to accommodate 2,500 people.

To the east of the ring building a five-story and basement building, for the accommodation of the various riding clubs, will be erected. This will be a departure from the ordinary arrangement of a riding academy, for heretofore the rooms of the riding clubs, except those of the New York Riding Club, have been in small officelike rooms, scarcely large enough to hold the lockers of the members. The club building will be fitted but with an electric elevator and all the modern improvements, and besides the clubrooms there will be smoking, reception, and dining rooms, a ladies' parlor, and in the basement, where the dressing rooms will be situated, will be the marble baths and 250 lockers.

The building west of the central building will be for the horses and carriages. It will contain several carriage floors and also stalls for 400 horses. A band stand for forty musicians will be built over one end of the ring, and, according to the new plans of William Durland, who is to manage the business, there will be music rides every afternoon.

The three buildings will be steel structures, built of red brick and terra cotta, and will be protected as well as is possible from fire. An advantage which the patrons of the new academy will have will be a direct entrance to the Central Park bridle paths. At present the equestrians are obliged to enter the Park from Fifty-ninth Street, and there is usually a crowd of cars near the West Fifty-ninth Street entrance. In order to get safely into the Park or out of it, a rider must be extremely cautious at present, and with a fractious horse, it is a dangerous undertaking.

The Park Department, however, has decided to cut an entrance to the Park bridle paths at Sixty-sixth Street on Central Park West, and this entrance will be within 100 feet of the academy.

When the present riding academy was opened by Mr. Durland twelve years ago, equestrianism was not so much in vogue as it is at present. The academy started in business with only twelve school houses, and none on board, and to-day there are 300 horses boarded for private riders, while 200 academy horses are necessary for the daily business at the academy. Mr. Durland says that the increase in equestrianism has grown steadily and continues to grow.

McGILL LOSES AT HOCKEY.

All-New-York Team Scores 10 to 0 Against the Canadians.

An All-New-York team, composed of the best players of the Amateur Hockey League, defeated McGill University of Montreal last night at the St. Nicholas Rink in West Sixty-sixth Street, by a score of 10 goals to 6. The Canadians did not play as well as they did on Friday, while the All-New York team's play was very fine, Fenwick, at cover point, doing some brilliant playing.

Both teams played a fast game in the first half. T. A. Howard of All New York making the first goal by driving the puck in from the side. At the end of the half the score stood 4 to 2 in All New York's favor.

The latter's players rushed matters at the opening of the second half, making three goals in rapid succession. After they had secured a big lead they finished the game on the defensive.

Ship from Honolulu Quarantined.

PORT TOWNSEND, Washington, Dec. 30.—The British steamship Blomfontein arrived this morning, eleven days from Honolulu. Having come from a plague-infected point, she was subjected to a thorough inspection by both United States and State quarantine officers. Her arrival was reported to the department at Washington by United States Quarantine Officer Foster. No traces of disease existed on board. The department, however, ordered her to be sent to the Diamond Point Quarantine Station for fumigation.

No Plague Scare in Japan.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec 30.—Advices from Yokohama, dated Dec. 12, say: "The plague scare has subsided, only a sporadic case being now and then reported, while the vigilance of the authorities is undiminished. The entire empire, through the unprecedented cleaning up which has taken place, will be a gainer from the visitation of the scourge."

Progress of the Plague at Noumea.

MELBOURNE, Victoria, Dec. 30.—Advices from Noumea, New Caledonia, say that five whites there have been attacked by the plague. One of them has since died. Fifteen Kanakas and Chinese have died from the plague and twelve are under treatment.

HARVARD WINS AT CHESS

Her Men Capture the Eighth Intercollegiate Tournament.

The Crimson's Experts Ahead for the Sixth Consecutive Time—The Final Games Exciting.

Columbia made a bold bid in the final round of the eighth annual intercollegiate chess tournament yesterday to recover the ground lost in Friday's fifth round, but to no purpose, for although the champions of the Blue and White succeeded in downing both their Princeton opponents, they were unable to reach the Harvard total by half a point, inasmuch as Perry and Rice, the Cambridge men, between them won and drew a game at the expense of Yale. The final scores were Harvard, 9 games out of 12, and Columbia, 8½. Harvard, therefore, for the sixth consecutive time, captured the intercollegiate championship after the most exciting race for the honors of the entire series.

E. R. Perry and C. T. Rice, who scored 5 and 4 points, respectively, were awarded the medals as members of the champion team. Rice's total was equaled by Cook of Yale and Falk of Columbia, and surpassed by Sewall of Columbia. Perry, the Harvard champion, emerged without a single defeat, as did Cook of Yale, the former having drawn two games and the latter four. Rice, Falk, and Sewall each lost but one game.

On the first board Hunt opened with a Giuoco piano, in the course of which he lost considerable ground by repeated exchanges. Falk, his adversary, took good advantage of the position, and eventually won a pawn. On the forty-fifth move the game was submitted to the decision of the referee, who awarded a win to Falk.

The game between Perry and Morgan on the second board was a Vienna opening, with a subsequent king's gambit variation. Morgan evidently was caught unprepared, and in consequence of his very erratic defense, white won a pawn on the tenth move. The next moves simply defy description. Morgan sacrificed a knight for one pawn only, and to exchange immediately thereafter, so that his attack, if he expected any, fell naturally to the ground, and Perry won in the easiest style after forty-one moves.

The real contest of the final round was the one between Rice and Cook on the third board. For once Rice discarded his favorite queen's opening and started out with the king's bishop's game, which by and by transformed itself into a tame variation of the Giuoco piano. Cook exchanged his pawn's knight for a hostile bishop, but then failed to see the danger from his adversary's open rook's file, which he had created by the exchange, and on the seventeenth move he lost a pawn. A tedious end game ensued, and was finally drawn after fifty-one moves.

The game on the last board between Henley and Sewall was a compromised variation of the Evans gambit. The first nine moves were made according to the book, but then Henley selected a weak continuation, which not only enabled Sewall to make his position solid, but to take the aggressive himself. In the following mix-up the Princetonian lost a rook and the game after thirty-five moves. The scores:

COLD GOLF AT LAKEWOOD

Forty-six Players, Undaunted by Weather, Invade the Links.

MALLOUF MADE LOWEST SCORE

For a Sixteen-Year-Old Boy He Furnished a Decided Surprise—More Golf To-morrow.

Forty-six golfers braved the rigors of the coldest day that Lakewood has seen this season yesterday and appeared on the links of the Lakewood Golf Club bright and early to compete in the first rounds of the New Year's tournament given by the club. This large aggregation of enthusiasts from many local clubs showed that golf was very much alive at the very end of the year. Findlay S. Douglas did not appear, as had been expected, but there were plenty of other good ones, and, notwithstanding the zero atmosphere, some excellent scores were made.

N. Mallouf, a new-comer in the arena of golf, but who has been doing good work on the Garden City links for some time, furnished a decided surprise by turning in the lowest score, and thereby winning the prize for that honor. He is only a sixteen-year-old boy, but played in fine style. His record was 93, 2 better than the score made by W. H. Davis, the Lakewood crack, who won the chief trophy at the recent Atlantic City tournament. In the first match play round of the first eight, in the afternoon, Mallouf found a sturdy foe in Francis A. Walthew, and the latter won by 2 up and 1 to play. Walthew was a frequent competitor at Lakewood last year, but he has been in Galveston, Texas, for nearly a year, and took a prominent part in organizing a golf club in that city. Walthew received a royal welcome by his club mates, and his playing showed that he was still well on to his game.

The committee divided the contestants in five groups of eight, according to their scores in the medal play round, and each set finished one match play round in the afternoon. The semi-final and final rounds will be played to-morrow, special prizes being given to the winner in each event, and, in addition, there will be an open handicap, in which over fifty players will start.

Claflin were second, with 119 from scratch, the best gross record, and Miss Wilson and W. A. Hamilton got third place.

GOLFERS IN FLORIDA.

Many Eastern Players Compete on Southern Links.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. AUGUSTINE, Fla., Dec. 30.—Northern golfers are coming into Florida on every train. Among those of more or less prominence from the East now here are R. C. Watson, Sr., New York; C. Menzies Miller, New York, who won the cup at Ormond last Winter; Clayton Dixon, University of Pennsylvania golf team; Curwen Stoddart, Jr., Philadelphia; J. P. Greaves, Manhattan Club, and Major J. F. McLain, Pittsburg.

In the New Year's Cup, in the handicap tournament played on the Florida East Coast golf links this afternoon, Clayton Dixon and T. M. Walker of the Florida East Coast Golf Club tied for the first prize on a net score of 86. Dixon had a handicap of 2 and Walker one of 10. The tie will be played off Tuesday. There were twenty-five competitors.

All players here will contest for another New Year's cup Monday on the links of the St. Augustine Golf Club.

McCOY-MAHER FIGHT.

The heavy-weight battle between "Kid" McCoy and Peter Maher for a purse of $20,000, which will be held to-morrow afternoon in the arena of the New Coney Island Athletic Club, promises to be a drawing card sufficient to bring out a crowd almost as large as that which attended the Sharkey-Jeffries fight.

Both men are clever at their peculiar styles of boxing, and both have hosts of friends who have come from long distances to see the battle. The big clubhouse will be thoroughly heated, and the management has arranged for quick transportation, both by trolley and the elevated road.

The boxers will enter the ring promptly at 3:30 P. M., so that even if the fight goes to the limit the public should reach New York by 6 P. M.

McCoy and Maher differ in their methods as much as possible. The former is scarcely more than a middle weight and his opponent will have a big advantage in weight. But McCoy is probably the most skillful boxer in the ring to-day, and he knows also how to punish badly. He sent Sharkey to the floor several times, and has knocked out very big men with ease. Maher is a fair boxer, but is a better hitter than a ring general.

Warlow Athletic Club.

The new building of the Warlow Athletic Club, at Whitestone, is completed, and is one of the handsomest structures of its kind on Long Island. It cost $10,000, and is built of brick, two stories in height, with a frontage of 45 feet and a depth of 81 feet 8 inches and a frame extension containing the gymnasium, 30 by 50 feet. A clause is contained in the club's deed to the property providing that the building shall be used for social, literary, and athletic purposes and that no liquor shall be sold on the premises.

RACING IN CHICAGO.

The Tracks in and Around the City Will Divide Time.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—R. Fitzgerald, representing the Chicago Jockey Club, and Secretary M. Nathanson of the Harlem and Lakeside Jockey Clubs, agreed to-day upon plans for the Chicago racing season of 1900. Lakeside will open May 10 or 12 and race fifteen days. On May 30 Harlem or Hawthorne will open, and the two will alternate until Oct. 27, Lakeside closing the season with another fifteen-day meeting. It is agreed to waive claim to twenty-five days for the Washington Park Club, if the latter should decide to race. Harlem also issued a list of seven Spring stakes and Lakeside five. Hawthorne will announce its stakes in a few days. Both Chicago tracks will issue a big list of stakes in June for their Summer and Fall meetings. The Harlem stakes are:

Turf Congress handicap, $2,000 added, for three-year-olds and upward, mile and three-sixteenths.

Horse Sellers May Clash.

Special to The New York Times.

LEXINGTON, Ky., Dec. 30.—Kentucky breeders who have advertised to sell the yearling produce of their farms at Sheepshead Bay at the beginning of the meeting there, say they will carry the war to a finish, and unless the Easton Company gives way there will be sales going on at both the paddocks of the American Horse Exchange and the Easton Company. The latter company claims that last year it lost the sale of nearly half of J. B. Haggin's yearlings by the clash. It claims the other company has usurped its date.

MOUNT CLEMENS, Mich., Dec. 30.—The Mount Clemens Ice Yachting Club is endeavoring to bring the Hudson River and Lake Minnetonka, Minn., ice racers together on Lake St. Clair. A letter received from Gov. Roosevelt says that the Hamburg Ice Yacht Club, of which he is a member, is anxious to try conclusions with the Minnesota racing craft.

SEVENTH REGIMENT SHOOT.

W. H. Palmer, Jr., Won the Diamond Badge in the Bull's Eye.

The "Diamond Badge" was competed for at the Seventh Regiment armory rifle ranges last night, in connection with the standing and prone bull's eye matches. The badge, which is one of the oldest trophies of the Regimental Rifle Club, was won by W. H. Palmer, Jr., who made the greatest number of bull's eyes, eighteen, in the two matches. It will remain in his possession until competed for next year.

The entries were unusually light in both matches last night, and the shooting, as a whole, fell somewhat below the club's standard. In the bull's eye match, standing, ten shots are fired. Bull's eyes only count, the greatest number in any string winning. Ties are decided by the location of the bull's eyes. The three prizes were awarded last night as follows:

	Bull's Eyes.
Private W. H. Palmer, Jr., Company G	6
Sergt. R. M. Kalloch, N. C. S.	6
Private W. M. Phillips, Company D	5

In the bull's eye match, prone, the same conditions prevail as in the standing match, except that any man making ten bull's eyes is permitted to continue shooting until he misses the bull's eye. The winners and scores of last night's match follow:

	Bull's Eyes.
Private W. H. Palmer, Jr., Company G	12
Sergt. R. M. Kalloch, N. C. S.	9
Corp. E. S. Coy, Company D	9

The following additional qualification as a sharpshooter was made last night: Private H. Pinner, Company B—200 yards, 34; 500 yards, 31; total, 65.

NINTH REGIMENT TEAM WINS.

Defeats the Second Naval Battalion Men at Indoor Ball.

An interesting Indoor League baseball game was played at the Ninth Regiment Armory last night, the Ninth Regiment team defeating the Second Naval Battalion team by a score of 14 to 12.

Indoor baseball does not require the skill of the regular outdoor game. The diamond is small, so that a player reaching first base can easily steal to third. The ball used is about four times the size of the regulation baseball, and as to the bat it resembles a broomstick. There are nine players on a side.

The Ninth Regiment team won last night because of its good batting. Deegan, the pitcher, practically won the game for the home team, not by his pitching but by good batting. The score by innings:

Saroney then took the lead, which he held, See finishing second. Harry P. McDonald won three events, the potato and combination races and a two-lap foot race in walking shoes. Harry G. Nevins won the other events, an obstacle race and an egg, spoon, and umbrella race.

Chicago and Northwestern's Plans.

OMAHA, Neb., Dec. 30.—Omaha contractors have been notified that the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad will call for bids for the construction of a line from Norville, Iowa, to Sioux City, and from Sioux City to Carterville, S. D., as soon as the Sioux City and Pacific line has been disposed of. This would indicate that the Northwestern expects to buy in the Sioux City and Pacific, which it now operates, when it is sold under mortgage foreclosure.

ROMANTICISM AND REALISM.

The Respective Adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Jones Turned Out in Widely Different Results.

Nobody doubts that Jones's wife has an imagination, not even Jones himself, who is the most prosaic fellow that ever put by a comfortable bank account. It all happened, the friends of the Joneses say, because of Mrs. Jones's imagination, an imagination, by the bye, that is strongly tinctured with a sense of the romantic and not at all humorous.

This is what led up to it. Late one night Mrs. Jones returned from a two days' visit with a relative somewhere over on the Jersey flats whose connection, while somewhat distant, necessitated a yearly exchange of visits. Mrs. Jones's eyes sparkled, and looking closely one would have said that the generous tear was not very far away. Her small, delicate frame effervesced excitement. Throwing her bag on the table and her gloves on the floor she began:

"O John, I had the strangest, romanticiest adventure that you ever heard of. You can't guess in a million centuries, you poor, old, dull, unromantic thing, what it was."

Here Mrs. Jones had to pause and kiss Jones, who really was very comfortable to live with, in a sort of breathless parenthesis.

Of course Jones wanted to know all about it, though it gave him a queer little feeling to hear Aimee—her mother had had an imagination, too—go on enthusiastically about something no part in which he realized he could have.

"Well, then, John, dear," recommenced Mrs. Jones, after several long parentheses and a vinculum, "it was just like this: The train got in rather late, and, of course, by the time I got over to this side it was real late. I will admit, dear, that I felt just a little bit nervous and looked all around for you, but—"

"Never mind that now, dear; I'm telling you, you know. I didn't see you at all. So I clutched my bag a little closer for comfort, and started for the 'L' all alone. I must have been a little rattled, I think, and turned off into a side street. Anyhow, the way seemed very queer, and finally I got into a very dark corner. Then two men jumped out. One of them grabbed my bag and the other kissed me—"

"What?" yelled Jones.

"No, dear, he almost did, but he just didn't," hastily amended Jones's wife.

"Well," Jones weakly said, resuming his chair.

"I was too frightened to scream. I felt myself going to faint, only I never faint, you know. Well, just then a young man, I couldn't tell that he was young at the time, and very well dressed, came running from nowhere at those two fellows. He knocked one of them down, and, keeping his foot on him, grabbed the other by the collar and kicked him. Still holding them both, one with his foot and the other with one hand, he took off his white hat with a bow.

"'Should you desire, Madam,' he said, 'I can turn these two footpads over to the nearest policeman, who isn't, I venture to assert, more than two miles away, but in that event, Madam, permit me to inform you, you'll have to appear in court against them and the reporter there would get a story. So, perhaps, I better turn them loose.'

"Of course, I agreed with him. First bowing, he kicked each of them good and hard, and they made off in the darkness. I told him that I wanted to get to the 'L.' He pointed out the way to me, and then said:

"'If you will allow me, Madam, I will keep a few feet behind you until you reach the station; then you will, I think, be perfectly safe.'

"All this time he hadn't smiled at all. But he followed me all the way there, and just as I got to the foot of the 'L' stairs he brushed by me with an 'if you will permit me Madam,' preceded me up the stairs, bought my ticket, and then dropped it into the chopper's box. Then he waved the way for me to the platform. I thanked him. But he didn't say a word. He took his hat off his head, and I saw that his hair was quite long and curly. Then for the first time he smiled. Running rapidly down the stairs he walked briskly up the street—for I watched him—and disappeared.

"Triumph," said Jones, throwing his cigar away as though it didn't please him.

"Do you believe, dear," Jones's wife asked the last thing before she went to sleep, "that you would ever think to do a thing like that?"

But Jones seemed to be asleep.

The best and most artful endeavors of Jones's wife the next morning couldn't get much out of Jones. He answered with marked deference any question that required more than a "no" or "yes," but his words were few and something was clearly engrossing him.

"It must be that spiteful drop in calcite," Jones's wife concluded. Jones was a manufacturing chemist in Jersey.

"Oh, by the way, dear," Jones's wife exclaimed as she followed him to the door, "you know the literary club meet the day after to-morrow. I'm to read a paper. I am going to write one to-day on 'Chivalry in Modern Life.' I have for some time thought it a good subject, but you know now I can use yesterday's adventure as a pure instance," looking doubtfully at her husband.

NEW YEAR'S ON THE LINKS

Many Prizes Offered by the Golf Club of Lakewood.

BIG TEAM MATCH ARRANGED

Trouble with Caddies on Public Courses —Improvements in the College Golf System.

New Year's Day will be opened in the local golf world with several tournaments, most important of which will be the event at the Lakewood Golf Club, a custom that has been in vogue there ever since the club was organized. From a golfing standpoint the day will be much more lively than was the case on Christmas. The latter is more of a home day, and even if the enthusiasts do get out to the links for a little exercise, very few give themselves wholly up to the game for the day. But to-morrow it will be different, and the large number of players taking part in the Lakewood games yesterday insures many good competitions to-morrow. The different divisions of eights who qualified for the chief trophy and the consolation cups yesterday will play the semi-final and final rounds to-morrow, and, in addition, the club offers an eighteen-hole open handicap for two net score prizes and one for the lowest actual score. Secretary Jasper Lynch announces that advance entries for this handicap are not necessary.

The Laurence Harbor Golf Club has arranged two team matches with the Atlantic City Country Club, and twenty of the Harbor Hill members will journey to Atlantic City for the first competition to-morrow. The date for the return meeting is fixed for Feb. 12 at Laurence Harbor. The latter club hopes to lead off with former Champion Findlay Douglas on its team, and among others whom the Secretary has picked to go are Charles S. Cox, M. M. Singer, H. C. Villepique, J. M. Mason, John M. Ward, William Freeland, Irving Brokaw, N. Pendleton Rogers, James Potts, Jr., A. J. Morgan, Frank A. Moore, Joseph F. Stier, W. F. Daniel, Hunter Wykes, George P. Sheldon, J. Bradley Patterson, Arthur R. Parsons, and E. B. Alvord. Since the opening of its eighteen-hole course the Atlantic City links have advanced materially in popularity, and a number of competitions will be held there during the coming weeks.

Other competitions arranged for to-morrow include an eighteen-hole handicap at the Baltusrol Club, Short Hills, N. J.; a six-man team match between the Fairview and Mount Vernon Clubs on the former's links, at Bronxville, and several informal competitions on other links, including Richmond County, Harbor Hill, Crescent Athletic, Sunset Park, Cliff Haven, Knickerbocker Field, and the Staten Island Cricket Club. The golfers of Baltimore will also have a New Year's tournament on the Country Club links.

The open championship which was held on the Baltimore links last September has aroused the golfing enthusiasm to such a pitch there that rumors are afloat of more applications this year for future championships from the United States Golf Association. Some good suggestions may be found in the new caddie system just adopted by the Baltimore Club. Applications for boys are now made at the desk in the clubhouse, and the notice is communicated by telephone to the caddie house. When the player reaches the first tee, he finds his boy ready for him, having a card stamped with the time he was secured. At the conclusion of the game the card is again stamped by the caddie master. This system prevents overcharging, and gives justice both to the caddie and the player.

Speaking of caddies, it must be admitted that the system of dealing with them has often been sadly neglected in many clubs, and particular fault has been found this season with the caddie system at the Van Cortlandt Park public links. All the good things that were expected to follow last Spring from the appointment of a city professional did not materialize. Perhaps it was too much to expect in one season, when the work of enlarging the course to eighteen holes was under way. But when players are charged, time and again, 25 cents an hour, when 15 cents has been set as the authorized price, it is no wonder that they "kick," and demand redress. This matter has recently been brought prominently to the notice of Commissioner Moebus, and with Professional Bendelow's assistance he hopes to reduce the caddie system to something like law and order next year. A regular caddie master may be employed, and the boys will be given official badges, which will be revoked if the rules are disobeyed.

The same trouble has been experienced at the Jackson Park public links, in Chicago, where, it is claimed, the boys practically had the players at their mercy, charging their own prices and often jeering at those who refused to employ them. The Chicago golfers are clamoring loudly for a better management of their public links all around, and if continued, some radical changes may be made next season.

Golf has been responsible for many little fads and fancies for personal adornment. The golf scarfpin has become so common as no longer to attract attention, and golf club umbrellas have been seen in the hands of many would-be enthusiasts. An inventor, said to hail from Chicago, has devised a peculiar combination cane and golf buiger. The heavy lift at the reverse end of the stick fits the hand conveniently for walking purposes, and it is said that it will be found equally convenient in hitting a ball if the owner finds himself on a golf course without his bag of clubs. The inventor even has the temerity to declare that because plaids and golfing skirts have become so popular among women, he expects to see many of the fair sex in the near future walking with a golf cane.

The mild Christmas weather in Boston gave more than usual activity to some of the neighboring links. The Allston, Oakley, and Fall River Golf Clubs all held special members' tournaments, a mixed foursome being held at the Oakley Club, in addition to the handicap, and several women played over the entire course. There will be a few New Year's events in that locality, but most of the Boston links have been deserted for the season.

The golfers of Cleveland have been enjoying a lively little row over the question of consolidating the golf club with the Cleveland Country Club. Many members of one belong also to the other organization, and as the Country Club is building a fine new house and the golf club was dissatisfied with its old location, the time seemed ripe for an amicable union of interests. But when the matter was broached to the members of the golf club, whose names did not appear on the roll of the Country Club, trouble arose. It kept growing warmer every day until the golf club held a meeting last week to settle the matter. Red-hot speeches followed each other in quick order, and when a vote of the stockholders was called the consolidation project was turned down by a vote of 54 to 47. The golfers then decided to lease a new piece of land in a more central locality, and great efforts are to be made to open in grand style by May 1. Some of the Country Club men who were voted down now threaten to resign from the golf club, and the Secretary admits that the club will probably lose about twenty-five members. Some resignations from the Country Club will also follow, and the fight is liable to be protracted for several weeks.

The "so-called Pacific Coast championship," as a Los Angeles paper refers to the recent big California tournament on the Presidio Club links, near San Francisco, was won by John Lawson of the Burlingame Country Club. He defeated E. Conde Jones, one of the crack players of the Los Angeles Country Club, in the final eighteen-hole match by 4 up and 3 to play. Mr. Lawson was credited with making several 250-yard drives, at which the Los Angeles critic wisely says: "He must indeed be a wonder." The tournament was held under the auspices of the San Francisco and Oakland golfers, and was one of the largest ever given on the Pacific Coast.

Willie Anderson, the one-time professional at Baltusrol, is now at Oakland, and it is said that a match will soon be arranged between him and Dave Stephenson of the San Francisco Club. A new Scotch professional, Willie Watson, from old St. Andrews, has joined the golfing army in California, having been engaged by the Hotel Green Golf Club at Pasadena, and which just opened its new course with a three-day tournament. The Californians are also discussing the probability of getting up a big match for all the professionals on the coast.

Everybody knows that many golfers have their peculiar ideas about the success which certain clubs and balls may bring them in a tournament. The breaking of a favorite club has often been the means of defeat, at least the golfer says so. To some these peculiarities become almost, if not actually, superstitions, and Willie Collins, the professional, who was recently asked something on this subject, gave the following incidents from his own experience:

"The belief that a new ball and new club used at the same time is a sure hoodoo is old, and there are others just as ancient. For instance, many golfers will always change to a new ball if after playing two holes they have made a poor showing. I've found that replacing the ball which has been played over the first two holes with poor success always brings an improvement. The ball which has been the cause of the bad playing is never allowed to see the links again after it has been relegated to the bag until it has been taken to the shop, made over, and given a fresh coat of paint. The heath over an intense fire must drive out the evil something in those unlucky lumps of gutta percha, for I've kept a watch on them, and they often turn out a mascot instead of the former hoodoo."

Among the new local links which the coming season is likely to see in operation will be an eighteen-hole course, for which plans have recently been made by the Newark Athletic Club. The course will be laid out on a fine tract of land near Irvington, and Alexander Findlay, formerly professional at the Essex County Club, Orange, will superintend the work. There is an old farmhouse on the land which will be fitted up as a clubhouse for the golfers.

The college golfers, who recently held their annual meeting in this city, made several improvements in their system of conducting championship tournaments, but their decision to hold no championship in 1900 will be a disappointment in many circles. The changing of the annual tournament from the Fall to the Spring was the reason for abandoning the intercollegiate match during the coming year. As the last one was held in November at Garden City, it would practically put two in one college season if another were held in the Spring, and therefore the next meeting was fixed for the Spring of 1901. These college events are always regarded with much interest by all players and the big contest is one of the chief tournaments of the year.

Several local golfers have expressed the hope that a special intercollegiate tournament may be arranged for 1900. A meeting might be arranged conveniently between Yale, Columbia, and Princeton golfers, and possibly some of the players in the University of Pennsylvania, just admitted into the Intercollegiate Golf Association, would be glad of the opportunity to meet their brother golfers. Another point that the college men may realize when the next tournament is held is the necessity of having official representatives on the links, not in expectation of settling disputes, for, fortunately, those seldom occur among amateurs, but to be ready in case any little difficulties do occur, and also to lend some official dignity to the proceedings. The spectators who saw the final game at Garden City between Pyne and Averill noticed with surprise that the collegians had deserted the affair entirely. Neither the President nor Secretary of the association was on the grounds. The men, starting where they pleased, did not get off until an unusually late hour, and as a result the last few holes were played in darkness. The Spring season will give more daylight for the game, but a better system of managing details would surely meet with general satisfaction.

The Country Club of Lakewood has arranged a series of four mixed foursome tournaments, to be held on successive Saturdays in January, special prizes to be given in each event. The regular Saturday handicaps will be continued without intermission on the links of the Lakewood Golf Club.

BOWLING NOTES.

The Greater New York bowlers will not tour the country this season. This decision was reached so as not to interfere with the international tournament of the United Bowling Clubs of New York, to be held here next Summer.

***

The Harlem River boat clubs will hold their annual bowling tournament at the Harlem Palace alleys this season. The competition will begin about Feb. 1. The Wheelmen's League will also hold its tournament at the Harlem Palace, commencing about the same time.

***

The Executive Committee of the American Bowling Congress will meet in this city in a few days to discuss changes to be made in the game at the annual meeting in Baltimore on Jan. 9. The committee will recommend changes that will eliminate anything that savors of professionalism in the various tournaments now being conducted under the rules of the American Bowling Congress. A majority of the committee is known to be opposed to the plan adopted in several tournaments of awarding prize money to winners instead of securing suitable trophies with the fund created by the entrance fees as heretofore.

AMATEUR ATHLETIC NOTES.

The Amateur Athletic Union of the United States will probably hold the National boxing and wrestling championships under its auspices in this city during the month of January. The National Championship Committee is now at work arranging the details. The usual events will be given, and the committee expects the largest entry list ever received for a boxing and wrestling championship meeting. Since the Amateur Athletic Union revived amateur boxing and wrestling in this vicinity last year there have been many tournaments held in this district.

***

The Knickerbocker Athletic Club will hold another athletic meeting on Feb. 10 at Madison Square Garden. The meeting will not be confined strictly to track and field events. The events will include a game of college basket ball and an open college team relay race.

***

The Athletic Committee of Squadron A, N. G. N. Y. has arranged for the annual games to take place early in March. The games should prove sucessful because of the novelty of the events. A feature of the programme will be a mounted football game.

PROSPECTS FOR CORNELL CREW.

Last Summer's Freshman Eight May Furnish It Material.

The call for candidates for the Cornell University crew for next year will go forth a month earlier than usual. As soon as the students return from the holiday vacation Coach Courtney will start the ball rolling by calling out the 'Varsity crew. The veteran coach will begin work earlier than in previous years to see if the additional work will enable him to turn out one of the old-time crews.

There is good material at hand for Mr. Courtney to develop a champion crew. This is in marked contrast with the conditions that confronted the coach last year. Of the crew that failed to distinguish itself last Summer, there are five who will be candidates for the 1900 'Varsity. They are Hartley, bow; Vanderhoef, No. 2; Beardslee, No. 6, Dalzell, No. 7, and Robbins, stroke. Of the four-oared crew only Lyon and English remain. The winning freshman crew of 1899 should furnish men to fill the places left vacant by graduation. This crew, when it won the race at Poughkeepsie last June, made a remarkable showing. Indeed it was hinted at the time that Coach Courtney devoted a great deal of time to the freshmen, having the 'Varsity crew for 1900 in mind.

Beardslee, No. 6, has been in the 'Varsity boat for two years, and is not likely to lose his place. Hartley, bow; Vanderhoef, No. 2, and Robbinst, stroke, will have a hard task before them to hold their respective seats in the boat. Long's steering and coaching in the freshman race last June is sure to get the place of 'Varsity coxswain for him. Indeed there is no other available steersman at Cornell at present.

GOSSIP OF THE CYCLISTS.

A movement has been started in the East to reorganize the League of American Wheelmen, as this is thought to be the only way to restore the organization to its former power. Those who are fostering the new movement plan to adopt an entirely new constitution and by-laws which will eliminate everything that pertains to professionalism and cycle racing. It is proposed to turn the league into a National highway improvement association, intended to care for the rights and privileges of the rank and file of bicycle riders.

The foreign alliances will be continued, giving members touring advantages. The New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Ohio Divisions are said to be fostering the movement for reorganization. During the past two years the membership of the League of American Wheelmen has declined from 103,000 to 50,500. This loss of prestige is attributed to the loose policy of the league. This movement in the East should boom Otto Dorner for the next President. Dorner, who hails from Milwaukee, is a strong good-roads exponent and is the present Chairman of the Highway Improvement Committee. He has a large following in the West.

***

At the annual meeting of the New York Division of the League of American Wheelmen, held last week, Treasurer Bull's report showed the division to be in debt $1,000 less than a year ago. The most important action taken at the meeting was a resolution asking the Legislature to appropriate $1,000,000 for good roads throughout the State. Another resolution requests the Legislature to provide for a cycle path across the Brooklyn Bridge. A petition signed by thousands of cyclists in Greater New York favoring a path across the bridge will also be sent to Albany when the Legislature convenes. The delegates to the National Assembly were instructed to vote against the further control of racing by the League of American Wheelmen.

***

Bicycling is becoming popular in Cuba, as is evidenced by the fact that the approximate value of the shipment of wheels to the island during the year will reach $100,000. There are bicycle clubs of considerable numerical strength and importance in Havana and Cienfuegos, and in other parts of the island. A cycling journal has been established, and there is even an acknowledged set of road records made at different times during the year. The League of American Wheelmen has a representative in Havana with instructions to organize a body similar to it. There are many American cyclists in Cuba, and these will form a nucleus for a Cuban cycling league.

The Kings County Wheelmen have prepared the trophy which will be presented to the Greenwich Wheelmen as a reward for winning the team pursuit race at the meeting of the Kings County Wheelmen at Manhattan Beach last June, when Wahrenberger made the memorable ride which won the prize for his club. The competing teams on that occasion were from the Greenwich, Nassau, Harlem, and Kings County Wheelmen. The trophy is a handsome loving cup. The emblems of the competing teams are placed on the outside of the bowl, and are combined in a pretty effect.

"If the perfect brake is not finally evolved it will not be the fault of the English people," says The Bicycling World. "It is not easy to say which is the more eager—the public to try or the trade to supply brakes of every conceivable pattern. One of these brakes, which possesses the merit of being practically invisible, has a handle grip which is free to revolve on the bar, and is fitted with an internal screw which engages with the thickened and threaded end of a suitable stranded wire which runs through the bar down the stem and socket to a horseshoe beneath the fork crown and inside the front forks. To this horseshoe the usual brake pads are fitted, and twisting the handle grip draws up the brake against the rim. A spiral spring is fitted inside the stem to act not only as a moderator, but also as a means of insuring release when the brake is taken off. It is powerful and well fitted, though as an improvement the moderating effects of the spring might well be increased, as the effort of holding the brake on with the twisting grip is practically nil. It is one of the neatest of the front rim brakes which have yet been put on the market, as it is quite invisible from either side of the machine."

***

The Associated Cycling Clubs have arranged for their annual New Year's run. The start will be made from Fifty-ninth Street and Eighth Avenue at one minute past midnight to-night, and, as usual, the run will be to Yonkers. There is no time limit placed on the run, and nothing short of a blizzard will cause a postponement. The Gerbereaux Trophy will be awarded to the club whose member reaches the Florence Hotel at Tarrytown first.

***

Knowing that the only improvements to be made in bicycles must be in the line of detail, the big makers are bending all their efforts in this direction. Chief among the features of the 1900 wheel will be what is known as the "free wheel," combining a coaster and brake. One of the exhibitors at the Cycle and Automobile Show, to be held at Madison Square Garden, New York, during the week following Jan. 20, will exhibit a hub in sections demonstrating a new attachment for bicycles. The hub is so constructed that by back pedaling on a wheel fitted with it a clutch is released in the hub, and the rider can coast on his bicycle without removing his feet from the pedals. By back pedaling again, another clutch is put into motion, which acts as a brake, and the bicycle can be controlled on the steepest hill. When the rider is through coasting a pressure on the pedals in the natural way releases the wheel, and it can be driven in the same way as an ordinary wheel. The manufacturer claims that a man can save the exertion of twenty miles out of every fifty by the use of this invention.

STERLING PIANOS.

To-morrow history records the FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY of the STERLING COMPANY.

40 Years of Unparalleled Success.

During those 40 years time has wrought many changes. The little factory that Charles A. Sterling looked upon with pride has grown to more than twenty times its original size.

It took ten years of unceasing labor to bring the production up to 1,000 instruments per year. To-day it exceeds 8,000, and when additions now in process of construction are completed, we will produce 9,000 Upright Pianos annually.

STERLING PIANOS

are sold in every civilized part of the world. Our annual export trade exceeds that of any other high grade piano.

STERLING QUALITY.

Sterling Pianos are thoroughly made from the best material obtainable, on scientific principles, by skilled mechanics of long experience.

Perfection is the standard of quality in the Sterling factory.

Perfect in every detail, tone, touch, action, repeating qualities, sustaining qualities, wearing qualities, finish and design. None are lacking, all are of the highest order.

STERLING POPULARITY.

Nine Sterling Pianos out of every ten are sold because some previous purchaser recommended them to a friend or acquaintance.

"So Sterling Popularity is simply a question of quality," good enough to satisfy the most critical. Beautiful. None so handsome, for every modern Sterling is an art production.

Honestly Priced. What more would you have?

IN THE REAL ESTATE FIELD

A Glance at the Year's Business and Its Important Features.

ACTIVITY IN MANY SECTIONS

Latest Sales by Brokers—The Year's Dealings in the Auction Room—List of Offerings for This Week.

Real estate dealing, even at the best, is bound to show so many periods of activity and depression, now in one section, now in another, that any attempt to characterize in a few words the business of an entire year will prove unsatisfactory. It may be better, then, instead of trying to call 1899 successful or otherwise, to go through it, not in great detail, but rather to recall its more important features.

The close of 1898 marked the end of a period of three or four years during which the real estate market had been in a dead and alive condition, with a war and its disturbing influences contributing to cap the climax. In short, the opening of 1899 found the market in a condition to welcome an awakening and requiring only the infusion of a little vitality.

Fortunately, this needed vitality was at hand, and was derived from several sources. First of all, money on bond and mortgage became easier. Secondly, there were developments which led to very active dealing along three great thoroughfares—Fifth Avenue, Central Park West, and the former Boulevard—which made up no small part of the Spring's business. It was not until early in 1899 that Andrew Carnegie's purchase of two whole block fronts at Fifth Avenue and Ninetieth Street began to have its full effect, and then the scramble for the few remaining sites between Seventy-second and Ninetieth Streets began. Prices along Fifth Avenue in that section nearly doubled in three months, but prices seemed to cut no figure in the handling of such a gilt-edged commodity as Fifth Avenue lots, and the buying both by the intending builders of residences and by speculators went on until nearly everything that could possibly be dragged into the market had changed hands.

On Central Park West and upper Broadway there was no such flurry, but withal a large volume of business. The elevator apartment had just completed the experimental stage of its career, and with a successful future assured for it there at once arose a demand for the many fine corners on the two fine thoroughfares west of the Park, so admirably fitted for improvement with this class of structure.

In business properties nothing developed that could be called a movement, although transactions in the down-town section were not infrequent, with both investors and speculators as the principals. Indeed, it was not until July 1 that some of the most interesting deals in business property were consummated, including the purchases by the Central Realty Bond and Trust Company in Exchange Place and William Street, and by James B. Haggin of the ten-story building at Broadway and Broome Street.

The Summer months furnished much their usual run of professional dealings, which were remarkable only in that they continued well into the Fall, and those who have been looking for large deals since the 1st of October have met with little success. The one sustaining feature of the market during this period has been the steady demand for high-class dwellings, and throughout the upper Fifth Avenue section, along Riverside Drive, and on the streets between West End Avenue and the Drive scores of houses of values ranging from $40,000 to $100,000 have found ready buyers.

The last three months have had an enduring feature in the sale of the Orphan Asylum property, and this deal through its ups and downs has been a sort of storm centre in the movement of which everybody has had an interest, either real or supposed. That negotiations were brought to a successful close is a matter of credit to all those concerned, and another year will doubtless see well under way the improvement of what is now an unsightly block front on the very finest part of the city's finest street.

Two phantoms—those of increased taxation and the increased price of building materials—have hovered over the real estate market throughout the year, or, rather, have relieved each other in the capacity of disturbers. Early in the year it was the increased taxation, and no sooner had all predictions about its effect been set at naught by an active Spring market, than the building material phantom appeared on the scene. The latter, it is true, has been something of a reality, but an early readjustment of prices is looked for, and if the high prices have resulted in the deferring of some building operations, they have also had a wholesome effect in checking speculative building for a brief period.

The last week of the old year furnished two deals of considerable significance—the purchase of a large plot as the site for a fifteen-story apartment house, at Madison Avenue and Sixty-first Street, and the sale of the Simpson tract at Westchester Avenue and Southern Boulevard. The buyer of the latter is said to be an investor, who is not looking for quick returns, and the idea that the property will be heard of in the auction room this Spring is laughed at by the interested parties.

The Auction Room.

The beginning of the new year will be welcomed by the auctioneers and by those who follow the auction branch of the market. If an exception be made of the Eno estate sale held in October, the six months just ending have been without a single event of more than passing interest, and very few which were entitled to even that distinction. Little has been offered and less sold—a result for which both the condition of the market and character of the offerings may be held responsible.

For the first six months of the year, however, the auction room reflected strongly the prevailing activity at private contract. Early in January one day's dealings furnished the remarkably successful sales of the King estate's holdings on the upper west side and those of the Bathgate estate at Third and Wendover Avenues—the former realizing about $720,000 and the latter $487,000. In April interest centred in the sale of another $2,000,000 worth of the Eno properties. On May 4 the Peyton estate disposed of its many

AN OLD-FASHIONED COOK

Mrs. Emeline Jones Describes "Fancy Dishes."

TERRAPIN IN MARYLAND STYLE

Can Give Pointers on the Manipulation of Canvasback Ducks, Oysters, Puddings, and Cornbread.

Mrs. Emeline Jones is one of those famous colored cooks whom most people only know about from books. Of course she comes from the South, and it would read better if it was from Virginia, but in reality it was Baltimore. It is from there that she brings her reputation for terrapin, canvasback ducks, and cornbread, and she won't go back on her native place for anything. But she didn't know much about cooking there she says, excepting ducks, oysters, roasts, plum puddings, and good bread. Most of the other things that make her a famous Southern cook she has learned since she came North, and a good deal of it in New York, and to be able to educate a Southern cook ought to be a feather in New York's cap.

"But I have no occasion to be ashamed of Baltimore," says Mrs. Emeline Jones. I was raised in a splendid family there, Col. Hall's, and then when Miss Elizabeth Hall became Mrs. Whitridge and went into the city to live, she took me with her. I was only eight years old then, and many's the time she's pulled my ears. I staid with her until I was twenty-five, and then I went to a home of my own. But my husband didn't live but two years, and I came on to New York. I didn't think I should stay but a short time, but it is better to be here than to stay there and get only $8, though we didn't know any better. New York is the place where there is the style and people know how to live.

"A lady wrote to me from Baltimore the other day, asking me if I knew of a cook who would go to her from New York. But there are no cooks in New York who want to go to Baltimore. I don't know where all the Baltimore cooks are."

Mrs. Jones furnishes an illustration of how a plain, old-fashioned occupation can be brought up to date. The up-to-date cook lives in her own house and has a nice, little clientele of customers, to whom she goes from time to time to prepare special dinners for special occasions, and luncheons that are to be serious functions. This is an improvement many people think upon a dinner sent in by a caterer or taking dinner out, and it upsets the house less. And Mrs. Emeline Jones looks a cook to prepare a famous dinner every inch of her, and they are a good many of those.

"So you are the cook?" said a man to whom she went to cook one time.

"Yes," she answered.

"Well," he said, "you look as if you could eat everything that you cook."

"Yes," she replied, with her eyes sparkling, "I can."

Mrs. Jones has a nice, little flat up town, with a pretty little parlor, all draperies and ornaments, and people who are honored by being invited into her kitchen find it as neat as the proverbial pin. In this little flat she stays through the Winter, and in the Summer she spends three months at Long Branch cooking for John Daly at the Long Branch Clubhouse. Then she comes back and resist for a time before her Winter's work begins. She has cooked in a good many clubs first and last, and New York clubmen send to her when they want something special for a dinner, a few quarts of terrapin, say, at $8 a quart, and she prepares it at home.

"I cook for more women, though," Mrs. Jones says, "and go to their houses. But they send to me sometimes from the clubs. There was to be a little dinner at the Union Club the other day, and they sent to me to cook the terrapin. They don't want it with a cream sauce and wine and yolks of eggs. They like to taste the terrapin, and I make it Maryland style, with the brown sauce, and they send up for it. I have to know how many there are going to be and what they are going to have for dinner to know how much to prepare. At this dinner they had only soup and fish and the terrapin, with duck and a salad, and they wanted plenty of terrapin, and I sent them two quarts for a small dinner.

"I have cooked a dinner for fifty men. About the largest house dinner has been for thirty-two people, and usually they are for fifteen, sixteen, or eighteen. They send me word that they want me to cook a dinner at a certain time, and I go up to see about it and learn what is wanted.

"I must have eggs and butter and lard, extra cream, and I always ask for a sandwich loaf, for cooks never seem to have bread in the house. We allow five oysters for a person and a bird apiece; there is no need of getting more. Nothing ever troubles me about getting the dinner unless they have forgotten the things that I want to work with.

"I take a bag with my own knives and my fancy cutters and molds, for people seldom have two molds alike. I use the things they have in the house for cooking.

"We are using a good many tartines for dinners this Winter. They are made of ham chopped very fine and run through a purée sieve and mixed with mustard, horse radish, lemon juice, and mayonnaise, and served on small pieces of toast. The bread is cut very thin, and then toasted and cut into fancy shapes, and with the ham tinted with a little red isinglass they are very pretty. I sometimes have a cavier on toast with them, and that being black, the contrast makes a good appearance. Around each one is hard-boiled egg, chopped very fine, and then they are served on fancy plates on a silver tray, with radishes and celery.

"With the oysters on the half shell we serve Swedish sandwiches this Winter. To make these you get a loaf of white bread and a loaf of brown bread and cut eight slices, four of each. The brown bread being in round loaves, you have to cut the slices from the centre of the loaf to make them fit the white bread slices. Then you put them together, alternate slices of the white and brown, with plenty of butter; roll them in paper and put them in the ice chest to stay for some time. When you are ready for them you take the bread out and it is like a firm loaf, and you cut it down in slices from the end and cut it into small shapes, and it looks like chocolate. They are served on a plate with horse radish and whipped cream, and I take a lemon, score it, and prick little holes around it and put in bits of parsley, and put that in the centre, and it is very pretty.

"For soups this Winter there are the green turtle and the consommé Royal. Men don't like any cream soup because they get it on their moustaches. When there is to be green turtle soup they let me know before hand and I make that here, because it takes two or three days. Some people like a crab or chicken okra soup. I had one of those last night. Everything for that is cooked in the pot; the raw chicken, a slice of ham fried; then there are tomatoes and green peppers, and when it is cooked it is thickened and strained, carefully skimmed, and when it is all ready for the table there is a little of the breast of chicken put in and a few green okras.

"There is fillet of sole very often for the fish served with shrimp or coral sauce. With those are served little hot-house tomatoes, and I will tell you how they are done. They are peeled free from the skin and the inside taken out, and then comes a French dressing inside, and they are put into a deep kettle and put in salt and ice to freeze, so that the dressing will strike through the tomato and season it all. Then they are filled when they are ready to serve with cucumber that has been chopped fine and the water squeezed out in a napkin and thrown on ice in the napkin until time to serve. Then it is taken out and mixed with the dressing, and a little chopped parsley and the tomatoes are filled with it, and when on a platter or glass dish, with cress around it, looks beautiful, and any one would eat it. It is new this Winter and very nice to serve with fish.

"Most people like a saddle of mutton for a roast, or stewed caboh if they are tired of beef and mutton. But they usually like the mutton pretty well if it is cooked rare and juicy and served with a hot currant jelly sauce with chopped French chestnuts. For vegetables there are potato croquettes, green peppers stuffed with creamed rice, and some people like green beans. Some have one and some two vegetables. The croquettes are made into the shapes of peaches, pears, and apples, with a little stem of parsley in each.

"The potatoes should be crumbed with clear bread crumbs. I always take them from the inside of a stale loaf, have them rubbed through a colander, and then I have a little egg batter ready and dip them in that and then in the crumbs. They are beautiful for fried oysters.

"Some people have a fruit punch for an entrée or terapin, or if they don't care for that cheese croquettes with toasted crackers buttered. Every one likes those. Sometimes they have mushrooms on toast and some have creamed spinach shaped in timbal molds. Those are buttered and a layer of chopped hard-boiled eggs put in and then the spinach, and then set away until they will turn out nicely. With larded sweetbreads with a brown gravy those are very nice. There are two entrées for the dinner, and they can come wherever they are liked.

"The salad and birds come last. There may be a celery salad or the Waldorf-salad of chickory and lettuce, curled celery, and fresh tomatoes, or there can be a salad with apples and celery, two apples to two bunches of dressed celery. That is good with ducks, quail, grouse, or any bird you choose to name. At luncheons very often they do not have birds, but cheese croquettes with salad.

"I don't care for desserts and don't make any unless they want something in a pudding. Yesterday I made a nice whip of cream with strawberries through it because there were children. I whip the cream light, then sweeten it a little, and add a little vanilla. I melt two sheets of the white isinglass in a cup of warm milk and I beat that in after it is cool and put it in the mold and bury it in ice and rock salt to melt. I have some of the cream to whip up plain and flavor with wine or brandy as people like or perhaps a little vanilla to serve around it. In the mousse I made yesterday I put preserved strawberries into the cream before I put it to freeze and flavored the other cream with the juice. Children like the strawberries in it.

"There are a good many people in New York who keep those old Virginia hams, the Todd hams, hanging in their cellars, and they like those for dinner. They are served with a salad, or with broiled larded breasts of chicken. The ham has to be soaked two days and two nights, then it is washed, and put in a deep boiler with part water and part cider, plenty of cider and a cup of sugar. If I can't get cider I use a cup of vinegar with the sugar. Then it has to simmer for four hours, if it is small, not so long, and never stays until it is thoroughly done. The cider has softened it, and when it is ready I put it in a pan and remove the skin, put on a little sugar and cayenne pepper, and brown it in the oven, basting it with champagne. That is the way to cook those Todd hams—bake until they are just nice to slice. Serve it hot, with champagne sauce, with just a little over it to make it moist. It can be served from the pantry, but it is nice for people to see what they are going to have.

"You put a curled paper on the end of the hambone, and perhaps tie a ribbon bow at the upper end. Some just serve a lettuce salad, with French dressing with it, or there can be the broiled, larded breasts of chicken or quail, with a purée of chestnuts and sprigs of parsley on the chestnuts.

"One of the things we have sometimes is the supreme of chicken, chicken breasts stabbed with truffles and served with mushroom sauce and green peas, cresses, and parsley. Puffed sweet potatoes are very good, and some people have them instead of croquettes or with them. You can cut them into different shapes, and the children are wild over them. You have to cut them rather thick and throw into ice water, then throw into boiling lard, and when they have cooked two or three minutes you take them out and put them on brown paper and let them stand if possible where the wind will blow on them until they are cold. Then throw them back into the hot lard, and shake them up in the pot, not stir them, and they will puff up beautifully.

"At a dinner not so elaborate served for Christmas there were tartines, fillet of sole, with shrimp sauce; tomatoes filled with cucumbers, okra soup, turkey with cranberry sauce, and a brown gravy made in the pan with chopped livers. There were croquettes and puffed potatoes served with that dinner, strawberry mousse, celery salad, with cheese croquettes.

"The day of the dinner I go around to the house about 10 o'clock. If there is anything to be boned I usually have had that sent to me to do at home, and I have made the green turtle soup. I take a woman to help me, to look in the oven, and get this, that, and the other, and clear up. I never let any one do any cooking. The girl in the house has enough to do to answer the bell and get the family luncheon and clear up and get the servants' meals, and an early supper for them, without waiting on me, though I used to do everything. Then I get things ready, the salads and everything, and have them all ready the minute I want them. Dinner is not served until 7:30, and that means 7:45. They have a man and a girl usually to assist in the dining room.

"I always ask who is going to carve. If they say the man, I say, hadn't I better do it so that everything will be hot? If the man has to carve in the pantry it may not be, but if it goes up from the kitchen it is sure to be hot. I never begin to cook until 6 o'clock. It will not take a well-trimmed saddle of mutton but an hour to cook, and if it stands and is kept hot after it is cooked it will not be good. I usually recommend two small saddles when there are to be eighteen people, instead of one larger one. The man rings the bell when he is clearing the plates, and then I am ready when he rings a second time to send up the dinner.

"People like boneless shad in the Spring. I didn't know how to do that for a good while. People say, sometimes, let the fishman bone it, but he only takes out the backbone, and every little bone must be drawn out so that every mouthful of the shad can be eaten, and after it is boned it doesn't take five minutes to broil it. Tomato jelly I shape in molds, and with dressed celery in the centre, and when it is clear it is very pretty, but it has to be colored a little. Sometimes I mold pâté de foie gras in chicken jelly."

A RAILROAD BUILDER'S VIEWS.

Montreal Man Talks of Canadian Progress and China's Future.

David D. Mann of Montreal, who, with his associates, has built thousands of miles of railroad on this continent, is at the Waldorf-Astoria. Just now Mr. Mann is engaged in the construction of the Canadian Northern Railway.

"The road," he said, "will run from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, and thence to Edmonton, a distance of 1,200 miles. Where it may be continued later on is problematical. I built portions of the Canadian Pacific Road, but the Canadian Northern is an entirely independent corporation. It has no business relations with other companies.

"About 500 miles of the road have been completed, but five years will probably elapse before the whole system is finished.

"About 800 miles of the country traversed is rich in wheat lands and cattle herds. North of Lake Superior there are rich deposits of gold, silver, copper, and iron. Railroad communication is all that is necessary for the profitable development of the country. Then, too, there is plenty of lumber.

"Business was never better in Canada. In all branches of trade everybody is at work. The people of the Dominion are loyal to Great Britain, and it would be an easy matter to raise 20,000 men to go to South Africa. More than half that number are clamoring to go. The Canadians are perfectly satisfied, and no people on the face of the earth have more privileges seven days in the week. They respect the laws with which no reasonable persons will find fault.

"I have just returned from China, where the construction of railroads is under serious consideration. The Flowery Kingdom is replete with grand possibilities. One great set-back is what is known as the 'lekin' tax. That permits the Mandarin in every province to tax goods in transit. Railroads will do more than anything else to eradicate this outrageous system of taxation. I am a great believer in a grand future for China under properly regulated conditions."

BROADWAY FIRE ALARMS.

False Calls and the Timely Discovery of Dangerous Tenement Blaze.

Four alarms were rung in for fires in Broadway between 12:20 and 1 o'clock this morning. Two of the alarms proved to be false.

The first alarm came in from the automatic box at 612 Broadway. While the firemen were looking for the fire flames were seen in the tenement at 113 West Houston Street, the first floor of which is used as a dry goods store by Jacob Jacowitz.

The flames spread so rapidly that Chief Croker, who had charge of the firemen, sent in a second alarm. The firemen soon had the flames extinguished with a loss of $1,500 to the building and Jacowitz's stock.

The building is occupied by sixteen families, and these people ran to the street, many of them, in their night clothing. They were greatly excited, but no one was injured.

During the progress of the fire some sparks from an engine standing in front of 612 Broadway, where the first alarm came from, dropped into the slot of the cable road, setting fire to a lot of waste cotton and oil. The flames shot about twenty-five feet in the air and burned for several minutes.

A few minutes later another alarm was rung in from the automatic box at 576 Broadway, a seven-story building, but the firemen found no cause for it.

Syndicate Buys Two Lake Steamers.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Dec. 30.—Parks Foster, general manager of the Owen Line of lake steamers, to-day sold to a syndicate of Detroit and Chicago vesselmen the steamships Parks Foster and Ira J. Owens for $220,000. President McVetty of the Detroit Dry Dock Company is the principal of the syndicate. The Ira J. Owens is a steamer of 1,753 tons, and was built in Cleveland in 1887. The Parks Foster's tonnage is 1,720. They are twin vessels, each 282 feet length, 39 feet beam, and 19 feet depth.

HORSES PERISH IN FLAMES.

Three Alarm Blaze Next to Dr. H. D. Gill's Veterinary Establishment.

A fire, which looked so threatening at the beginning, as to cause three alarms to be sent in, started on the first floor of the four-story brick stable at 156 East Fifty-seventh Street at 10:45 o'clock last night. The place is owned by A. J. Kaplan.

Flames burst from one of the windows so fiercely that twelve engines, four trucks, and four battalion chiefs were summoned to the fire, which gained headway rapidly for a time. There were thirty horses in the building.

The attention of the firemen was directed at the beginning of the fire to the New York College of Veterinary Surgeons, at 154, run by Dr. H. D. Gill, who lives on the top floor with his family. All the inmates of the place had to leave, and the children were carried out by Dr. Gill and Policeman Godley of the East Fifty-first Street Station. There were a number of horses and some dogs in the place, and they were got out safely and taken to a near-by stable.

The firemen fought the fire from the roofs of adjoining buildings, and they ran hose lines through houses on Third Avenue, Lexington Avenue, and on Fifty-seventh Street, controlling the flames in half an hour.

Many of the horses in the stable broke from their stalls and scrambled about during the fire to get away from the flames. Nobody dared go into the burning building after them. Only six of the horses were got out alive, the rest being burned or suffocated. One horse, old and blind, will probably have to be shot. Two of the burned animals were a team belonging to Dr. H. D. Nicoll of Fifty-seventh Street and Park Avenue, who also had a coach and set of harness, in all valued at nearly $2,000.

On the top floor of the building were eleven trained dogs, the property of Harry Tyson, who was to take them to Philadelphia for exhibition to-day. All but two of the dogs were taken out alive. They were Reddy, a poodle, and Jack, a black and tan.

Besides eleven sick horses in Dr. Gill's place there were a number of animals used by the Board of Health for anti-toxin experiments, and three valuable trotting horses. One is Jack, who won the Speedway Cup, and is owned by Mrs. Gill. Two others are Iron Bar and Prince, owned by Cord Meyer. There were also two prize dogs—Tommy Pickle, a bull terrier, and a fox terrier owned by Police Inspector Kane. Benjamin Rosenfeld, who kept a tailor shop on the ground floor of the building, suffered almost a total loss.

During the fire a steam gauge on Chief Croker's automobile blew out and scared a number of people standing near it. It did no damage and was patched up so that Chief Croker could return in it.

The fire was out by 11:30. Water had done damage to the saloon of F. H. Meyer, at No. 158, and to Dr. Gill's place. Chief Croker estimated the loss at $20,000. No cause for the fire is known.

HER ADOPTED CHILD GONE.

Mrs. Oakley Believes a Woman Has Kidnapped Annie Hagan.

Annie Hagan, twelve years of age, the adopted daughter of Mrs. J. W. Oakley of 1,280 Hoe Avenue, has disappeared from her home. Mrs. Oakley thinks that she has been lured away by a woman.

The police of the Tremont Station have sent out an alarm for the child. She is described as being small for her age, with a wealth of short curly hair and large blue eyes. She wore a small plaid brown dress, a green double-breasted coat, and a black Alpine hat. She has not been seen since Dec. 20.

Mrs. Oakley said that last April she visited the Home for Destitute Children, in White Plains, N. Y., for the purpose of adopting a child. She was struck with the beauty of Annie Hagan. She learned that her mother, a widow, lived in Peekskill. The officers of the institution told Mrs. Oakley that the child was one of the most tractable that they had received in years; that she was excessively fond of children, and assisted in the care of the little ones at White Plains.

Mrs. Oakley lately noticed that the girl had plenty of money to spend. She thinks that a woman has taken a fancy to the chid and by means of pennies has induced her to leave home for the purpose of taking care of children. Mrs. Oakley is as much distressed over the disappearance of "Curls," as Annie is known in the neighborhood, as if she were one of her own children.

STABBED IN HIS SHOP.

Italian Fruit Dealer's Probably Fatal Fight with Three Thieves.

Peter Deferst, an Italian fruit dealer at 430 East Twenty-third Street, was attacked in his shop about 6 o'clock last night by three men and probably fatally wounded by being stabbed with a knife in the abdomen. The police, who are working upon the case, believe that it was premeditated robbery. The neighborhood around the Italian's place of business is darker than usual on account of the destruction of an electric light plant supplying that locality during the Twenty-fourth Street fire last Friday night.

The Italian was burning candles in his store, and he says the men took advantage of the dim light to hold him and attempt to rob him. He is known to have saved money, but the robbers did not get any of it, so far as can be learned. He fought them off, cutting one in the head with a knife after he was stabbed, and then they all fled. He followed them to Twenty-third Street and First Avenue, where he fell from exhaustion. He was removed to Bellevue Hospital.

Frank Barry of 441 East Twenty-third Street, a newsdealer, was arrested by Detective Corr late last night on suspicion. He denied being anywhere near the place at the time of the assault. An Italian, however, said he saw the man about the place at that time, the police claim. The police say Barry has been spending $50 a day lately.

Morphine Overcomes a Teacher.

Miss Jennie Hall, twenty-six years old, of 224 West Forty-second Street, a school teacher, was taken to Bellevue Hospital last night, suffering from an overdose of morphine. The woman some years ago was forced to undergo an operation, during which she took morphine. It is said that she became addicted to the use of the drug and took an overdose of it yesterday.

The President Praised in Boston.

BOSTON, Dec. 30.—There was a large attendance at the annual meeting of the Essex Club at the Parker House this afternoon. The speeches were notable for their expressions of warm approval of the Philippine policy of President McKinley. George Von L. Meyer, the President of the club, presided, and among the guests was ex-Congressman Lemuel E. Quigg of New York.

Virginia Druggist Commits Suicide.

NORFOLK, Va., Dec. 30.—B. R. Hood, a druggist, of Smithfield, committed suicide yesterday by taking laudanum.

St. Louis and the Chicago Canal.

From The St. Louis Republic.

It appears safe to predict that the Chicago Drainage Canal will not be opened under the permit granted by ex-Secretary of War Alger. St. Louis claims that the permit so issued lapsed when Congress convened; that Alger had power to issue the permit only in recess of Congress. There is every indication that St. Louis will be able to enforce this contention in the Federal courts. Whether St. Louis can do more than this, whether she can establish her claim that Missouri would be injured by the opening of the canal so that Congress will refuse consent or require adequate assurance that no other State will be injured by the canal; whether, if Congress, over St. Louis's protest, permits the opening, the Federal courts will interfere in behalf of St. Louis remains to be seen. St. Louis should fight the opening of the canal at every stage.

A Country Lawyer's Income.

From The Kansas City (Mo.) Journal.

There is evident misapprehension in the belief that practicing law in a country town means a life spent just a little beyond the reach of starvation. Between 1885 and 1897 the late John Sheridan of Paola, Kan., took in $50,000 for legal services.

The Minister's Perplexities.

From The Boston Christian Register.

When a minister is settled over a parish, he very seldom knows exactly why he is settled; and, when he is dismissed, he does not often know precisely why he is not wanted.

OHIO'S VALUATION METHOD.

Far-reaching Effects of the Decision Respecting Telephones.

From The Columbus (Ohio) State Journal.

The decision of the Ohio Supreme Court holding that the telephones of the Bell Company shall be taxed on their rental value instead of their actual cost, is one of the most important rulings on the subject of taxation that has been handed down since that which sustained the validity of the Nichols law, taxing franchises. The decision in the telephone case is, in effect, simply an extension of the general principles of taxation upon which the Nichols law is based. Manifestly it will be far-reaching in its effect. If telephones are taxed on their rental value, it is apparent the same method of valuation will apply to every device operated in a similar manner.

The Bell telephones are not sold outright. They are rented to the Central Union Company, which operates them in Ohio. The actual cost of each telephone is said to be about $3.40, and heretofore they have been listed at this valuation for taxation. The Bell Company exacts a rental of $14 a year, net, for each telephone, four times its actual cost. Computed on the legal rate of interest, the rental value of each telephone would be $233. Whether they shall be listed at this figure, or only two-thirds of it, in conformity with the general rule of appraisement of property for taxation, is not known. It is expected that this and other important points involved will be elucidated in the decision, which is to be reported fully.

Ohio has taken advanced ground upon the question of taxation, and it is notable that other States have followed her lead. Progress in this State has been along the line of equalizing the burdens of taxation. The Nichols law was a long stride in this direction, but it is obvious the limit has not yet been reached. The decision of the Supreme Court in the telephone case will remedy a manifest injustice not reached by the Nichols law. The general principle of the taxation of franchises has worked no hardships and will not so long as it is applied within the limits of sound business policy. On the other hand, it has increased the revenue of the State, placing its finances upon a solid basis, without increasing the burdens of the people.

Ex-President Harrison and His Dogs.

From The Chicago Tribune.

Ex-President Harrison, in a faded velvet suit, on his way for a hunting trip from Indianapolis Thursday, was dragged through the waiting room of the Union Station by two big dogs which he had in chains. He gave them slack, and immediately they showed symptoms of wanting to lie down. Then they would start in opposite directions and almost pull the General's arm off. He seemed to be having as much fun out of it as the dogs, and when they got him tangled up in the chains he laughed as loudly as the people who witnessed the scene. The General had promised Hamilton County friends to undertake to bag some of their game. He is the only man in Indiana who is not stopped by farmers whose lands are posted against hunting.

Not Disposed to Recede.

Stout—No, I shouldn't believe it.

NATIONAL CAPITAL TOPICS

Washington to Enjoy New Year's in an Old-Fashioned Way.

GENEROUS FUND FOR LAWTON

Dog Scare in the District of Columbia—Superiority of Krupp Armor Plate —Senate and Pensions.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—The New Year will be observed here, in a social way, something after the old fashion, but in the matter of calling there promises to be a smaller observance of the former custom, which has been dying out year by year. Washington set the fashion for Presidents, when he was first President, and came near to abandoning it before he went out, in consequence of the unhappy inharmony of politicians and the outrageous personal abuse to which he was subjected—abuse with which later Presidential detraction, even within the last twelve years, seems mild and inconsequential by comparison.

Presidents since Washington have discovered, in the size and temper of the crowds that waited upon them at the White House on New Year's morning, the effects of partisan rancor, and doubtless have wished for a moment that as private citizens they might resent the slight put upon the Chief Magistrate. President McKinley has been fortunate as most of his predecessors have not in avoiding personal opposition. The White House reception on Monday, to which no one is bidden and to which everybody may come, promises to be large and diverse, as it naturally must be with the gates thrown back for all the citizens of the United States who can get through them, in double file, between 12 o'clock and 3.

There will be a special attraction in the White House observance on Monday. Admiral Dewey will go through the Blue Room at the head of the body of naval officers on duty or resident in Washington. Not since Admiral David D. Porter made his last official call upon a President, wearing the four stars indicating that rank in the wearer, has so much naval distinction graced the New Year's reception. Later callers are not likely to see Admiral Dewey, for with his wife and Mrs. McLean, together with a very large party of young lady assistants, he is to receive the officers of the navy, the army, and the Marine Corps between 12:30 and 2:30 at the house of Mrs. McLean. The official receptions will be large.

Private receptions will be fewer and smaller than ever. Twenty years ago pages of space were used in the papers to announce the names of persons intending to receive and those who would not receive calls. Gradually the list has become shorter, until now it is confined almost exclusively to persons whose names seldom appear in any other way as social figures. The card basket at the door takes the place of the former announcement that advertisers would not be at home on New Year's Day.

The War Department has learned during the week that the tendency in the country to appreciate and be generous to our eminent and valuable defenders has not been seriously impaired in consequence of some rude manifestations of disapproval of certain actions that were made the occasion of deep distress to a universally admired hero. The response to the announcement that a fund would be raised to place the widow of Major Gen. Lawton out of the reach of want for the rest of her life, providing her not only with an unincumbered home, but with the means to maintain it and to provide for her children for many years, has been so generous and quick as to give assurance that the modest and courageous Lawton was appreciated at his full worth by his fellow-citizens.

Gen. Corbin is confident that the fund will reach to $50,000 before the subscriptions cease, and that will be twice as much as was looked for when the announcement was made that the army would endeavor to give Mrs. Lawton assurance of its practical sympathy. It is regarded as altogether probable that Congress will allow to Mrs. Lawton a full year's pay—$7,500—of a Major General, just as Congress allows a year's pay to the widow of a member of either House dying during his term. Then there are propositions to give the widow a pension, which may be as much as $2,500 a year. It seems probable that in this case there will be no ground for complaint that devotion to duty and the intelligent and useful performance of it have been disregarded. On the other hand, the effort to raise a fund for a "Schley Home" has languished. It was an ill-advised undertaking, and it received a decided local setback when the tumult was created about another "home" provided by popular subscription.

Every man who has a soft spot for dogs in his anatomy is provoked to compassion by the appearance on the streets of dogs secure from the dog catcher because they wear muzzles, and is stirred to something like rage by the frequent sight of alarmed and muzzleless dogs that manifest every sign of alarm at the approach of human beings and are continually scampering off as if they had become impressed with the idea that every moving thing on two legs is a dog catcher ready to swoop down upon them with nets and a wagon to carry them off to the pound and to the smothering box and its charcoal fire. Just where and by whom the dog scare in the District was started may not be worth while hunting up, but the Commissioners of the District have become thoroughly imbued with the notion that this city is a centre of infection; that rabies is a disease to be feared and carefully watched and stamped out, and that to prevent the development of it and so exterminate it, all dogs, whether bitten by other dogs or not, shall be restrained by muzzles.

Scientific support has been given to the action of the authorities by Dr. D. E. Salmon, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture, who has published here a paper on "The Reality of Rabies and the Importance of Its Control." He insists that there is such a disease as rabies; that the experience of Great Britain in putting muzzles on dogs demonstrates the usefulness of that precaution in reducing the number of cases, and that the disease is more prevalent in Winter than in Summer. That may be so in France, England, and Germany, but his figures for Washington show that of 35 cases here since 1895, 9 were noted in Winter, 4 in the Spring, and 6 in the Summer, and 16 in the Autumn. The sellers of muzzles are doing a good business, and are suggesting the advisability now of muzzling cats, which are subject to rabies just as dogs are.

Under the prohibition placed upon the Navy Department by the Naval Appropriation bill of the last session of Congress, it has been found impossible to armor our new battleships or to make any contracts for armoring new ships authorized by the last Congress. It was only by consenting to the Senate proposition to limit the cost of plates to $300 a ton that the bill got through at all, as a very determined stand was taken by those who entertained the belief that the price demanded by the steel plate makers was excessive and ought to be reduced, even if the Government was obliged to set up its own establishment to obtain steel plates at a lower cost. Russia, having no notion that the Government should resolve to make cheap iron or steel, contracted for the building of an armored cruiser in Philadelphia, with plates of the modern Krupp steel for protection. The first trial of this plate was made on Thursday at Indian Head proving ground. While it did not answer the complaint that Krupp steel plates ought not to cost $600 a ton, it appears to have demonstrated that a Krupp plate of eight-inch thickness is equal in resistance to our Harveized plates of ten to twelve inches in thickness. This is the plate with which the Retvisan is to be provided, and which will assure all needed security with a great saving in weight, to be employed as the constructors may deem advisable. The navy must, it is admitted, provide the new battleships with the best possible armor. If it is to be made by the Government a plant must be obtained. Some members of the Naval Committees of the two houses have asked the question whether the Government has not acquired ownership of the steel plate mills by reason of the fact that when the production was undertaken the makers of plate were paid high prices with the understanding that they were to get the cost of the plant out of the contract. Yet the Government has gone on paying high prices ever since, the presumption being that the plants have long ago been paid for in contracts at rates higher than they should have been.

Commissioner Evans seems to have been backed up very well by the Senate Committee on Pensions in the rules adopted by that body to govern its treatment of pension cases that come before it. They declare that they will not go beyond $50 a month in granting pensions to widows of officers. Then all cases that come before the committee having been rejected or approved by the Pension Office will not be entertained for a year after the action of the Pension Bureau. This is in approbation of the efficiency of the Pension Office, and is only to be departed from in the cases of persons who are more than seventy years of age or in cases rejected because they could not for technical reasons be taken up by the Pension Bureau. No cases will be entertained at all until it has been shown that they have been submitted to the Pension Bureau or that they have no status in that bureau. Claims pending and not acted upon in the Pension Bureau are not to be entertained, nor will propositions be considered to restore to the rolls widows dropped for remarriage, unless the applicant was a widow during the soldier's service and is now a widow in actual need. Brothers and sisters of soldiers who expect to secure pensions for that reason are all warned that it will be useless to apply to the Pension Committee of the Senate. The presumption is that the same course will be adopted in taking up bills that get into the Senate from the House, even if they have obtained sanction in the lower branch of Congress.

Prominent officers of the Government are complaining of a species of annoyance to which occasionally they are subjected, and for which they admit their inability to suggest or provide an adequate remedy. From time to time, and particularly during the last week, very sensational and scandalous reports have appeared in newspapers printed out of the District of Columbia. They charged officers of the United States with practices deliberately unlawful, and if true would have rendered the offenders subject to be deprived of office and of their personal liberty. Promptly upon the appearance of these stories the representative or representatives of the papers in which they were published have appeared before the officers alluded to to ask them what they have to say touching the accusations. The usual reply has been to refuse to discuss the accusations, either to deny or explain them. On more than one occasion a reporter has made his way to the man he sought to say that he was not responsible for Washington dispatches carrying grave charges, but that dispatches not sent by the offices here, or dispatches sent with correct reports, have been repeatedly altered after transmission, for what purpose the writers could not explain. The result of this practice, and of the annoyance experienced by men who find themselves arraigned before an irresponsible tribunal is to make public officers more reticent to those with whom they can speak frankly without fear of being misrepresented. The effect upon the average man with whom newspaper men come in contact is to give the impression that too many of them are blackguards unfit to be admitted to confidence. The public officer here cannot be properly complained of as too reticent. And the body of correspondents generally has justified the confidence reposed in its members. Most of them know more things that they could print, but do not, than would be comfortable for public men who might see them in print.

Sir Henry Irving has enjoyed not only a week of good patronage of his performances, without a crush, but he has been the guest of many prominent persons at luncheons and after-the-play suppers and receptions. Secretary of War Root invited him to his house to meet a small company of official, army, and society people; Sir Julian Pauncefote gave him a luncheon, and on Thursday he was entertained by Postmaster General Smith. One day he called upon the President at the White House, and was presented by Secretary Root and Postmaster General Smith, both of whom he had met before. When shown the "war room" at the White House, Mr. Irving expressed great interest in the facilities provided for keeping the President informed of the operations of fleets and armies, and was especially gratified to discover that there were maps with marked positions to illustrate the operations of the British Army in the South African campaign. THE CERCLE FRANCAIS BALL.

Elaborate Decorative Scheme in View for Madison Square Garden.

One of the most elaborate schemes of decoration for the interior of Madison Square Garden yet attempted is that planned for the carnival and masquerade ball of the Cercle Français de l'Harmonie, which will be held on the night of Jan. 15.

The interior of the great building will be transformed into a huge pagoda, the high roof being entirely concealed by a canopy of white and gold cloth, which will hang in wide folds from the centre and be carried in graceful curves to the walls. A number of large National flags will be festooned in balloon form from the apex of the canopy. The color effect will be brought out strongly by 2,000 incandescent lamps strung above the canopy of white, gold, and the National colors.

A promenade twenty feet wide, extending around the dancing surface, will be marked off by a series of thirty decorative columns, fifteen feet high, made of staff. These will be connected by festoons of evergreen, from which 860 colored Venetian lanterns will be suspended. Palms and other tropical plants will be used in the decoration of the boxes. Strings of signal flags, festooned from the apex of the canopy roof to the top of each column around the promenade, will complete the scheme.

FUNERAL OF A MAINE VICTIM.

The funeral of Frederick Holzer, twenty-two years of age, one of the victims of the battleship Maine, took place from Cecilia Hall yesterday morning. At 9 o'clock the members of the Cecilia Society to the number of fifty gathered in the hall and at the same hour a company of forty marines and eight sailors from the navy yard, under the command of Lieut. Dewey, a nephew of Admiral Dewey, landed from a tug at the foot of East Seventy-ninth Street. The marines and sailors marched at once to the hall.

On the arrival of the marines and sailors, at 9:30 o'clock, the members of the society gathered about the coffin containing the body, and while the American flag was removed and the naval ensign substituted, sang the hymn, "Above the Skies." The coffin was borne to the hearse by six sailors and the funeral procession was then formed. First came a detail of police, then a band, then the detail of marines and sailors, and then the hearse with the six sailors as escorts. Fifty coaches, containing the mourners and the friends and relatives of the deceased followed.

The procession moved down Avenue A to Eighty-first Street, thence to First Avenue to Eighty-seventh Street, and to St. Joseph's Church. As the coffin was borne into the church the members of Cecilia Society aided by the choir sang "Libera." The church was crowded to the doors, and large numbers of people stood in the street to watch the removal of the coffin from the hearse to the church.

Solemn requiem mass was celebrated by the Rev. Father Chidwick, the Chaplain of the battleship Maine. He was assisted by Fathers Weber and Stack. Father Lamell, the rector of the church, acted as Master of Ceremonies.

After the services the body was removed to the hearse and the procession went to the Ninety-second Street Ferry, and thence to St. John's Cemetery. A firing party of seventeen marines accompanied the body and fired three volleys at the grave.

Brockton Shoe Record Broken.

BROCKTON, Mass., Dec. 30.—Over half a million cases of shoes were shipped from this city during the year 1899, the exact number being 524,185. This is the largest in the history of the trade in this city, and is an increase over last year of 46,482 cases. These figures mean that more than 11,000,000 pairs of shoes were shipped, not including thousands of pairs sent by mail, of which no record is kept.

Mrs. Eddy Gives Her Son $25,000.

LEAD, S. D., Dec. 30.—Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy of Boston, the Christian Scientist, has given her son, George Glover, of this city, a Christmas present consisting of a check for $10,000 and a clear title to a $15,000 dwelling house.

WHAT INTERESTS CHICAGO

The Steads Order a Pro-British Book on South Africa.

Appliance for Securing Pure Warm Air —Grocers Fight the Glucose Trust —Mr. Moody's Career.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 30.—The Rev. W. D. Mackenzie, Professor of Theology in the Chicago Theological Seminary and pastor of the New England Congregational Church, has been asked by the Steads of London to write a book for them on South African affairs. The volume is to deal with the life of Cecil Rhodes, his character, and career; the real Paul Krüger, his strength and his weakness; the causes of the present war, viewed from behind the scenes, and a graphic story of the races and personalities, the geography, and history of that section in which the whole world is now interested. The reason that the Rev. Dr. William Douglas Mackenzie has been chosen to act as historian for this remote land is that he was born there, and was the son of the Rev. Dr. John Mackenzie, who lived in South Africa for forty years as a missionary, and who knew intimately all of the persons who have taken prominent parts in the heavy drama of the Transvaal. He was, in fact, one of the most remarkable and far-seeing persons who was ever identified with part of the country, his attitude being pro-British to an extreme, and the position of his son being no less pronounced. Dr. Mackenzie openly declares for imperialism of the sort "that has succeeded so magnificently in India."

PLANS OF THE ZIONISTS.

The plan of the Jews to purchase the Holy Land for the occupation of their race has been much discussed in Chicago during the last week as a result of the meeting of the Knights of Zion at Porge's Hall. Hundreds of members of the order were present, including delegates from other cities. One of the chief moving spirits has been Leon Zolotkoff, delegate to the third congress of Zionists at Basle, Switzerland, held last August. A number of the leading Jews of this city are deeply interested in the scheme of purchasing Palestine for purposes of colonization, feeling it to be a benevolent undertaking of the first magnitude. It would be a haven for the oppressed of their race from all countries, they maintain. There are several thousand members of the organization in this city.

WIDE WAGON TIRES FAVORED.

An ordinance compelling the use of wide tires on all vehicles used upon the streets of Chicago was introduced before the City Council several months ago, which will soon come up for consideration, and is likely to be passed. The desire for it is strong at the City Hall, where it is claimed that the use of wide tires would have an enormous effect in saving the pavements and easing the labor of horses. The exact width of the regulation tire is not yet decided upon, but it is to be not less than four inches. Mr. Crossette, the Street Cleaning Commissioner, says that wide tires would preserve instead of destroy asphalt; that instead of cutting it in ruts it would roll it down. Wagonmakers are inevitably interested in this subject, and one of them has invented a wide tire with a flange on it so that if it became necessary to use a street car track, the wide tire would not prevent it. It is hoped that before the wide tire ordinance comes up for consideration, an accompanying clause will be prepared, limiting the load to be hauled by a team. Between four and five tons should be the limit of burden for a single team, though it is the practice of some teamsters to compel two horses to haul seven or eight tons.

DWIGHT L. MOODY'S CAREER.

The death of Dwight L. Moody has brought up many recollections of him here, where he began his man's work. The story of the evangelist's life is on the shelves of the Chicago Historical Society, and discovers the fact that he came to this city in 1856.

In 1858 the directory agent enters him in the city book as a clerk at 255 Wabash Avenue. In 1862 he is enrolled in the city directory as a missionary, with a room in the Methodist Church block. In 1865 the directory shows that he accepted his first permanent pastorate, his charge being the Illinois Street Mission Church. The number of pupils of the Sunday school attached to this mission was 900. Later his address shows him to be President of the Young Men's Christian Association. In 1872 his name appears as Superintendent of the North Side Tabernacle. The record of his founding of the great undenominational common church, which now stands at the corner of Chicago Avenue and Clark Street, is of a sort not to be found in directories. It involves the story of the genius of the man, who, by simple, homely, unimaginative means, called about him vast crowds of common people, and who, moreover, retained a hold upon them that was lifelong or of many years' duration. The largest religious meetings ever held in Chicago were in the seventies, when crowds gathered in a vast, temporary tabernacle to listen to his talking and to the singing of his associate, Sankey. Many sermons have been preached upon him in this city, not a few of which entirely overestimated the man's gifts. He was without the finer qualities of the mind—without poetry, intellectual passion, or scholarship. A simple, direct, earnest preacher, believing what he talked, a magnificent organizer, and a practical, honest, unaffected leader of undeviating ideas, tremendous industry, and the one splendid conviction of the divine destiny of the human soul.

SCHEME OF HOUSE VENTILATION.

W. D. Boyce, the Dearborn Street publisher, is preparing to hibernate in an atmosphere of hot air, dried and renovated to suit. He has invented a system which will supply him with heat, ventilation, and fresh air in unlimited quantities, minus Chicago dirt. The suite which he is to heat and ventilate consists of two large rooms and a bathroom. In the attic above is the machinery. A square room of three compartments is the essential part of the contrivance. In the first room is a window which stands always open. Opposite the window are two wooden frames covered with a black, porous cloth. The air coming through the window passes through these screens, which catch all the dirt, dust, and impurities. Beyond the screens is a second compartment wide enough to accommodate a steam radiator. The radiator is located opposite an opening in the zinc partition between the second and third compartments. Coming through the screens the air is heated by the radiator and passes on to the third compartment. At one end of this is a circular opening leading into a circular box containing a fan about four feet in diameter. The fan, operated by a motor, creates a draught by revolving, and thus draws in the heated air, and then sends it into a large galvanized iron tube extending the entire length of the apartment below.

Branching off from the main pipe are five other pipes extending to the sides of the ceilings of the rooms below. By means of these pipes the heated and cleaned air is carried into an open space completely circling the ceiling. The space is like a small oak box, and it really forms part of the finishings of the apartments. At the bottom of the box there is a small slit for the air to escape into the rooms. In the bathroom there is a reostat, which controls the electric power and consequently the velocity of the fan. Attached to a radiator outside of the air room above is a thermostat, which regulates the steam pressure and keeps it at an even temperature. In warm weather the steam is reduced or turned off, and Mr. Boyce has normal temperature purified. The rest of the system consists of a large fireplace which will allow the air to escape after it has been used. It is the expectation of the inventor that he will be able in this manner to protect himself from the filthy air of the town.

GROCERS FIGHT GLUCOSE TRUST.

About a year ago the Glucose Syrup Refining Company issued circulars notifying jobbers that on and after Feb. 1, 1899, all cash discount would be abolished. This action raised a storm of protest from the jobbers, who are obliged to allow the retailers a cash discount. The Sugar Trust paid no attention to the protests, however, and issued another circular last November, stating that after Jan. 1, 1900, the company would abolish the guarantee on corn products. This last proposition has aroused the Wholesale Grocers' Association to action. The jobbers object to being compelled to stand the loss in every case where goods have not been properly manufactured, and therefore spoil on the hands of retailers, when it is too late to make complaint. Many of the syrups sent out do not have the proper body for Summer use, and easily ferment, particularly if the manufacturing has not been of a scrupulously careful sort. To lose because of bad work on the part of the manufacturers is not to the liking of the jobbers, and a call for a meeting of the wholesale grocers was signed by the officers of many State associations. The call may be considered a declaration of war against the Sugar Trust in the event of its refusal to accede to the demands of the jobbers in syrups and jellies.

UNIVERSITY STUDENTS EXCITED.

There is much exciting discussion among the students of the University of Chicago as to whether or not a denominational spirit controls the great school. It is the proud boast of professors and students that it does not, yet a professor has recently been disciplined for speaking words which are declared to be not orthodox. It is also noteworthy that in the sociological and psychological classes all that is most radical and experimental is discussed with vaunting independence. It is said by the students that this intellectual revolt is inevitable. At any rate, it exists, and the young professors of the philosophies are said to be the leaders in these excursions into the realms of untrammeled thought.

The forces for practical democracy are earnestly at work, not the least influential of which is the Settlements, of which there are now eleven, all of them in prosperous condition and increasing in influence and in possessions—possessions which are the common property of all in the neighborhood who choose to avail themselves of the privileges offered. FRANK D. CROFT DEAD.

Brother of the Surveyor Was Hurt in an Accident Dec. 12.

Frank D. Croft, forty-seven years of age, a carpet dealer at 26 and 28 East One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, and brother of Silas C. Croft, Surveyor of the Port, died at his home, 28 East One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, yesterday morning from the result of injuries received on Dec. 12. On that day Mr. Croft was crossing One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street at Fifth Avenue, and was run over by a milk wagon. Both his legs were broken and he received other bodily injuries.

He was removed to his home and attended by Drs. Demorest and Donovan. Up to 11 o'clock Friday night he was thought to be improving, but at that hour he began to fail until at 1 o'clock he died.

The driver of the milk wagon after the accident hurried away and has not been seen since.

EX-POLICEMAN HANNIGAN FREE.

Governor Grants Jacob Riis's Petition and Pardons Him.

Jacob A. Riis, who has been instrumental in making improvements in the conditions of the east side poor, received a letter at his office, 301 Mulberry Street, yesterday morning from Gov. Roosevelt. The letter was as follows:

Executive Mansion,
Albany, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1899.

My Dear Jake: Happy New Year to you and yours, and as a New Year's gift take the pardon of Policeman Hannigan. The papers were forwarded to the prison this morning. Always yours,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Policeman Hannigan, on Thanksgiving Day, 1897, saw a crowd of boys playing football in the street at One Hundred and Seventh Street, between First and Second Avenues. He attempted to disperse the boys. One of them, Frank McNally, sixteen years old, who lived in One Hundred and Seventh Street, picked up the ball and started to run away with it. Hannigan who was in citizen's clothes, pursued him, but failed to gain on the boy. When at One Hundred and Second Street, in First Avenue, Hannigan fired at the boy in order to stop him. He hit McNally in the back.

Hannigan was subsequently tried and sentenced to two years in prison for felonious assault.

Mr. Riis has been endeavoring to secure his pardon from the Governor, and was much gratified at the action of Gov. Roosevelt in finally acceding to his request.

AN ELECTRIC EVIL EYE.

Well-Known Persons Named by Thompson as Exercising Influence Over Him — His Strange Petitions.

Piled up on a table in United States Commissioner Shields's office are twenty-six sets of papers, which by the binding and make-up appear to be legal in their character, but which are really the productions of a man, alleged to be a crank, who for over a year has daily disturbed the Judges and officials in the Federal Building. He describes himself as E. D. Thompson, a native of Waldron, Ind., and a graduate of a college in Cincinnati. Overstudy is said to have injured his brain.

The man, who gives his residence in this city as at 136 Lexington Avenue, imagines that Dr. Spitzka and others, including George J. Gould, have an electrical influence over him, and he is continually petitioning the United States Circuit Court to grant a restraining order which will free him from the mysterious electrical power. These petitions, which are on file in Commissioner Shields's office, have cost their author at least $1,000 in fees of typewriters during the last year.

One of the papers in question is to the following effect:

"It is alleged that E. D. Thompson has been influenced since about July 22, 1898, in his room, third floor, back, at 136 Lexington Avenue, by an electric telephone or an electric electrophone, or by such other designation unknown, and that he is so situated that he cannot change his place of residence or control the electric influence, which is there without his instance or request, and can be removed unless it is there by the representations to and process of the United States Circuit Court of New York, or any other United States district."

Others of Thompson's papers allege that George J. Gould, John D. Rockefeller, Judge Taft of Cincinnati, Judge Woods of Indianapolis, and nearly 100 residents of Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, whom he names, caused Dr. Spitzka to put an electric influence over the petitioner.

The writer prays the United States Circuit Court to grant a restraining order against these pesons, so that he may be relieved of the electric current which at present enthrals him.

Thompson demands the order on the ground of "equal rights and privileges," and quotes sections of the Revised Statutes which he thinks apply to the case.

The man is very particular about his documents, and spends hour after hour revising his petitions and adding new names.

When informed yesterday that his applications would not be considered by Judge Lacombe, Thompson was greatly disturbed, and said that he would carry them to the United States Supreme Court, in Washington.

Thompson's relatives at Waldron, Ind., well-to-do people, have been informed of his condition. Unless they take steps to have him sent to a private sanitarium the Government officials, who fear that he is becoming dangerous, say they will have him committed to an asylum. The father of the man is D. H. Thompson.

SAVANNAH CONTRACTORS UP.

Fight Begun Against the Removal of ex-Capt. Carter's Alleged Co-Conspirators to Georgia.

Benjamin D. Greene, Col. John F. Gaynor, William T. Gaynor, and Edward H. Gaynor, members of the Atlantic Dredging and Contracting Company, jointly indicted with Michael A. Connolly and ex-Capt. Oberlin M. Carter, United States Engineer Corps, for conspiracy and having defrauded the Government out of $575,749.90 in connection with the Savannah River and Cumberland Sound contracts, appeared for examination yesterday before United States Commissioner Shields.

The contractors are represented by the firm of Kellogg, Rose & Smith, which will make a bitter fight against the removal of the men to Savannah for trial. Mr. Rose, who is Capt. Carter's attorney, says the Government will have to produce on this examination all the evidence it possesses against his clients.

Since his arrest on these charges Col. John F. Gaynor has secured a divorce and remarried. His former wife, who claims that she has been "greatly wronged," will, it is expected, figure as a witness for the prosecution. She was in court week before last, when the examination was postponed, and she put in an appearance at the Federal Building early yesterday.

At the opening of the examination, Lawyer Rose made a motion that the contractors be liberated because the complaint on its face did not allege any specific offense or crime. He read extracts from the indictment, which alleges that the conspiracy and scheme to defraud had been going on since Jan. 1, 1897, and argued that it failed to specify any fraudulent act committed by any of his clients during that period, excepting in a general way.

District Attorney Burnett offered a certified copy of the indictment in evidence, but Mr. Rose objected, saying it could not be accepted while the indictment itself was within the jurisdiction of the United States. The law, he contended, does not give the Clerk of the Circuit Court of Savannah power to issue certified copies of indictments found in the Georgia district. He quoted the law on the subject and demanded the production of the original indictment.

Commissioner Shields said the point raised was a novel one, and that heretofore all copies of indictments had been accepted as evidence in criminal cases. Gen. Burnett remarked that it was the universal custom in the districts of the United States, and was allowed under common law.

Mr. Rose retorted that common law does not recognize the Clerk of the Circuit Court. He further said that Judge Brown's decision declared that a Grand Jury is not a court, and that Section 905 of the Revised Statutes specifies how documentary evidence may be introduced. Commissioner Shields overruled Mr. Rose's objection to the certified copy of the indictment, saying the matter could be taken before Judge Brown for a ruling.

Capt. Cassius F. Gillette, United States Engineers, of Savannah, Ga., was the first witness put on the stand by the Government. He identified the four contractors and said he had appeared as a witness before the Grand Jury in Savannah which had found the indictment.

Lawyer Rose said he was not prepared to go on with the cross-examination, and adjournment was taken until Wednesday afternoon.

Capt. Rees Ordered to Tampa.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 30.—Capt. Thomas H. Rees, Corps of Engineers, who was recently called to account by the War Department for visiting O. M. Carter, formerly of the army, in his cell at Governors Island, in contravention of the articles of war, has been relieved from duty at Fort Totten, New York, and ordered to take station at Tampa, Fla., relieving Capt. Henry Jervey, Corps of Engineers, who is assigned to Capt. Rees's former duties at Fort Totten.

MR. WAKEMAN'S ATTITUDE.

Says Dissatisfied Importers Should Appeal—Mr. Jacobs's Resignation.

Appraiser Wakeman said yesterday that he had nothing to add to his previous statements regarding the charges of the Merchants' Association against him. He was simply enforcing the law, he said, in returning certain grades of fancy cotton goods for a duty of 2 cents per square yard in addition to the ordinary duty, and if the importer thought such an assessment too onerous, he should go to Congress for relief.

The Appraiser received yesterday a letter from William C. Jacobs, tendering his resignation as Supervising Examiner of Sugar. On Nov. 13 Mr. Jacobs was suspended for four months by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Commission of Special Agents of the Treasury, which spent several months in investigating the Appraiser's office. Mr. Wakeman had previously recommended the dismissal of Mr. Jacobs, because of his course with reference to the appraisement of chocolate. Mr. Wakeman alleged that he found evidence that chocolate was being undervalued, and he advanced certain grades from 50 to 300 per cent. above the invoice values. His advances were, in the main, sustained by the Board of United States General Appraisers.

Mr. Wakeman then relieved Mr. Jacobs of all responsibility for that line of goods.

Mr. Jacobs has been retained as an expert by a number of houses engaged in importing sugar, and he has been designated by them to attend to all matters connected with the official sampling and appraisement of sugars imported by them.

INSURANCE AND INVESTMENTS.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Dec. 30.—Information which has reached State Insurance Commissioner Scofield may lead to an investigation of the insurance companies doing business in Connecticut. Mr. Scofield has been informed that some of the insurance companies are violating the State law by risking their funds in certain classes of proscribed securities. Commissioner Scofield is conducting a quiet investigation, which may become formal.

During the recent depression in the stock market many who were caught long on securities of the speculative class suffered severe y. This was known to Mr. Scofield, and, acting on private information, he decided to ascertain whether any of the insurance companies in this State were dealing in this class of securities. The investigation he is making may bring some of the insurance companies into the courts.

The laws of Connecticut require that investments by an insurance company of its funds shall be practically of the same class as those required of savings banks.

BOER RENT IS REMITTED

Dwellings May Be Occupied Free During Martial Rule.

WOMEN LOOT MANY STORES

Authorities of the Transvaal Express Satisfaction Over the Attitude of Portugal—Effect of Blockade.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

CAPE TOWN, Nov. 29.—An important proclamation, issued by President Krüger of the Transvaal, announces that owners or agents of dwelling houses have not the right to demand rent during the duration of martial law, and that they cannot after the repeal of martial law claim rent for the period it was in force. On premises let for stores or business purposes half rent will have to be paid during martial law, and this half may be claimed after the war. Premises where liquor business has been carried on until stopped by the Government, will be treated as dwelling houses; also farms or portions of farms on lease. Loans on ground or fixed property will not be liable to interest during martial law, and there will be no recovery after repeal. Loans under the amortization law would come under this category. As it would always be possible for a loan to be called up, in case of full interest being refused on the strength of this proclamation, it is doubtful whether it will effect any useful purpose. Business arrangements are also so complicated that interference with or recognition of them by these means seldom attains its object. The reconstruction of business life in the Transvaal will probably be essentially one of arrangement on the give-and-take principle. However, it is worth recording, seeing how large a number at present resident in Europe or America own property in the Transvaal or have rented it on lease, that many of the refugees from the South African Republic have consulted lawyers whose practices have been in Johannesburg or Pretoria, and there seems to be no doubt whatever, entirely apart from President Krüger's proclamation, that rent cannot be claimed from Uitlanders for the period of hostilities.

The Second Criminal Court, when information was last received from Johannesburg, was still sitting, but that was the only one. It has been ascertained from a Britisher who was granted a permit to remain in order to finish a Government contract and has only recently left the Transvaal, that up to the time of his departure there was no sign of any destruction of property, although there was no limit to the amount of secret thieving going on, and which, no matter how vigilant the authorities are, it is stated cannot be stopped. Law and order are well preserved, and the Government is praised for its efforts in this direction. Any looting of stores is done only by order of the Government. When the authorities require anything from a store that is closed, they simply burst the door open and take what they want, keeping a record of what they do take. Notwithstanding this, a lot of humbugging goes on; for instance, the commandeering of goods without the proper owners thereof being credited with them. A certain clique has sprung into existence which works with a doubtful class of storekeepers. Its method of doing business is to break into stores and transfer the goods, or such portions of them as it imagines the Government is most likely to requre, to the store of one of its confederates. When the commandeering agents come along the goods are handed over, and an order received for their value, which when cashed is divided among the gang. It seems to be extremely doubtful, however, whether any refugees holding receipts for goods commandeered will ever get their value, or even the estimated value as set down in the document.

There still remain in Johannesburg about 200 British subjects who hold permits, besides some who don't. The latter are mostly women, who imagine the Government will not harass them. It is much feared, however, that those still in Johannesburg will soon be sorry for remaining, and that they are by no means free from danger at the hands of the Boer population. It is estimated that the town contains enough provisions to last each individual at least three months.

After the general exodus and while the ordinary postal arrangements were still continued, all letters to and from Europe, &c., were opened by the authorities, in consequence of which several people had their fingers burned. The manager of the principal brewery, which, by the way, has an English Directorate, said in a letter home that they had plenty of provisions on the premises and sufficient arms to resist any attack. The letter was opened, the premises were searched, and the manager was told to get over the border as quick as he liked.

Among the Boers remaining in the Transvaal, every one, from the highest to the lowest, believes the British will be driven into the sea, and that the whole of South Africa will be Dutch.

Women have looted the stores in the Benoni district and secured goods valued at several thousands of pounds.

The parade of the Police Commando, said to consist of 400 sturdy warriors, excited general admiration. The Afrikander men had received their mandate from their women folk, though the shadow of Elandslaagte hung like a pall on the mourning robes of many. Venerable dames and maids upon whom the warriors showered a valedictory benison clung and struggled fiercely round the carriages. It was admitted that no finer or more serviceable force had been sent off. It was expected to be 800 strong by the time it reached the Natal border. It is under the Commandant of Police, Mr. Gert. M. J. von Dam, with Lieuts. Oosthuisen, Pohlman, Murphy, and Jacobsy next in command.

The men were addressed by C. D. Shutte, who said: "You are going to defend your rights, your liberty, and your independence; that dearly bought independence God has granted you, and which is once again contested. You are not going to fight for honor, or money, or mercenary ambition, or sordid gain.

"The English General of 1881, Sir Evelyn Wood, said in my presence to Gen. Joubert: 'I have nine medals; I shall have ten if I take Laing's Nek.'

"Gen. Joubert replied: 'You Englishmen fight for honor or for medals. We Afrikanders fight for our rights and the freedom which God has given us to repel the aggressor and to thwart those who would violate and possess our country, and for these, indeed, every Englishman would willingly sacrifice his life.'

"For thirteen years you have worked under me, and I had hoped I might be permitted to go with you and help defend our country. But Government has compelled me to stay against my wish. Never before has the fire of the Boers been more deadly, and never before have they shown greater courage in facing the foe. The Boers are fighting for justice, for their land and their liberty, and no wonder that ten rise to take the place of every one that falls. Never has the martial spirit prevailed among the Boers as now, and never have they been more united. It surprises South Africa, it astonishes the world. Let the Boer forces continue to act as they have done, and no one will question either their bravery or the Christian spirit which has animated them in the treatment of those who have fallen into their hands. The reports respecting the conduct of British soldiers, in butchering the wounded and firing upon the ambulance, are, if substantiated, sufficient to arouse the indignation of even the Kafir tribes, much more of the civilized world. It has been customary in a section of the British press to denounce the Boer as the epitome of barbarous cruelty."

Gen. Joubert wired in reference to the bombardment of Elandslaagte:

"We are thankful for the protection of God. We have forty wounded in our hospital. God is wonderful and God is good. It is wonderful how we escaped, as the place was very warm, but we were protected by God. I pray your Honor and people to offer a prayer to God for His kindness in watching over us this day, as it was by His hand, and by His hand alone, that we succeeded in holding the position. Our hope is in the Lord, and we will rely upon Him. We have still lots of ammunition, and we are doing very well."

Satisfaction is expressed by the authorities of the Transvaal at the very friendly spirit which is being shown by the Portuguese under the present unfortunate circumstances. The Transvaal press points out that at the time their ammunition was withheld they did not hesitate to express their disgust at the action, which caused a good deal of adverse comment then, and the effects of which still exist, though only in a small measure. They therefore the more readily express the acts of friendship which have been recently shown to them by the Portuguese authorities in the passing of their European mails through the Portuguese ports, the reception of fugitives and prisoners, the proclamation anent the exchange of Transvaal coinage, and the ordering, at the risk of the displeasure of England, of a British man-of-war to leave Portuguese waters. All these things, says the press of the republic, will not be forgotten when the days of peace arrive. The people of the Transvaal will know how to value such assistance as they have received from their neighbors. It is added that it cannot fail to further cement the bonds of friendship when the representative of the Portuguese Government at Pretoria is able to inform his people that the friendly disposition of the Portuguese people is highly appreciated by the Transvaal Government and people.

The people of Lorenzo Marques are complaining bitterly that Great Britain has blockaded the foodstuffs consigned to Delagoa Bay. Blockading up to a reasonable point is admitted by the Portuguese press to be justifiable and necessary, but it is contended that to extend the system so as to interfere with the very existence of the people of the town and district is beyond all reason. It is said to be quite easy to arrange with the authorities at Lorenzo Marques that no supplies for the Transvaal shall be sent on by railway. It is pointed out that, especially as the Portuguese authorities have loyally stood by the British Nation up to now, the treatment complained of is particularly hard. Before the declaration of war they prevented the transportation of ammunition through Delagoa to the Transvaal, although about the same time the Cape Premier allowed large quantities of it to pass over the colonial railways to the Free State.

Peculiarly enough, though there appears little difficulty of communication with the Transvaal, Delagoa Bay just now seems unable to obtain any but the scantiest of news from the outside world. Shipping is greatly impeded, and it is possible to reach or leave the place only after much bother and considerable delay; in fact, passengers who are not British subjects are refused permission to leave Natal for Lorenzo Marques. The closest watch is kept upon everything, which leads the inhabitants to suspect that something serious is on the move. The port has been honored by the arrival of one of the finest cruisers ever seen in the harbor. She arrived early in the morning and so surprised the Portuguese soldiers located at Lorenzo Marques that they rushed out with their guns without letting their officer know what mission they had on. He, however, followed in time to superintend the firing of the salute, which was anything but brilliantly done.

DISCIPLINE AT BELLEVUE.

Young Physician Suspended for Taking Patient's Money Without Wrong Intent—Complaints and New Rule.

Complaints are frequently laid before Superintendent O'Rourke of Bellevue Hospital to the effect that physicians in the hospital accept money from patients. It has been alleged, as well, that nurses and other employes receive money. The statement was attributed to Coroners' Physician Weston some time ago that patients in the hospital cannot receive the best treatment without paying for it.

With the suspension yesterday of Dr. N. H. Probasco of the Fourth Medical Division for accepting money in trust from a patient of Ward 23 came the culmination of the matter. He received some money to get certain delicacies. The matter was brought to the attention of Charities Commissioner Keller, who suspended Dr. Probasco for three months.

With the promulgation of the suspension there came the posting of an order by Commissioner Keller, which reads as follows:

Ordered, that no employe of the Department of Public Charities shall accept from a patient or other inmate any sum of money for any purpose whatever except with the knowledge or consent of the Superintendent of the institution in which the patient or inmate may be, and that any infraction of the rule will be punishable by instant dismissal.

There were many comments on the order. Superintendent O'Rourke said he had heard that some of the doctors said that the order did not apply to them at all, since it read "employes." He added:

"Just let any of them be caught accepting money, and they will find how quickly they will be dismissed."

Commissioner Keller said yesterday that Dr. Probasco was, as stated, suspended for taking money in trust from a patient, though he intended no infraction, since he said he did not know it was wrong to get delicacies for a patient. The Commissioner added that it would be the young physician an injustice to discuss the matter. The money had been returned, he said.

The chief point of comment about the new order was that money could be accepted with the consent of the Superintendent. This was interpreted by Superintendent O'Rourke to mean that patients at times want something not to be had in the hospital. They are permitted to pay for such things, and the Superintendent may authorize some one to take the money and procure the articles desired. The Superintendent acknowledged that complaints of the nature indicated had been made to him, but he had not been able to get evidence at any time.

WATER SUPPLY AND ECONOMY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The letter of Mr. Columbus O. Johnson, ex-Water Register of New York City, in your issue of to-day, ought to be conclusive on the question of leakage and waste of Croton water, and again proves the contention of the City Club that what we need is not more water, but greater care and economy of what we have.

Allow me to put Mr. Johnson's figures in a rather different light. Gen. Collis was supplied with and paid for 125 gallons of water per day for each of the eight people in his household, and he said and supposed that all the plumbing in the house was all right, in fact, had just had it repaired; that is just about the quantity which Commissioner Dalton says is supplied on an average for every man, woman, and child on Manhattan Island—121 gallons per day per capita, but when the plumbing was set right, Gen. Collis received only 53 gallons per head per day, and that is probably about the amount the citizens do actually use on an average, including all extra and outside consumption, as extinguishment of fires, factories, locomotives, &c.

It is fair to presume that the Fifth Avenue household of Gen. Collis used water more lavishly than the much more numerous people in the small tenements. We do not need more water, but greater economy.

To illustrate our wastefulness I inclose a diagram carefully drawn to scale from the last annual report of the present Commissioner of Water Supply, William Dalton. The expenditure of one-twentieth part of the amount of the proposed Ramapo contract would stop this waste and leave us with a much improved service due to greater pressure.

THE HEAVENS IN JANUARY

Two Partial Eclipses of the Sun and One of the Moon.

The Place of Distinction Belongs to Mars, Which Will Be Twice in Conjunction with the Moon.

The year that begins to-morrow brings promise of some beautiful celestial treats, and now that we know some little more about the sky and the wonderful and glorious oodies that people it, we shall take all the more interest in watching for the various programmes promised us. There are only three eclipses, however, two of the sun and one of the moon, and there is not an entire hiding of the disk in any one of the three. We are to have some close meetings between moon and planets as well as between the various planets themselves, and these are always interesting in themselves, disclosing as they do the fact that our celestial neighbors move about in the solar system, making it very often appear as though the sun itself "do move."

One of the compensations of Winter is the long twilight that seems to prolong the short day and make the early mornings and evenings beautiful with gorgeous clouds of superb coloring or with clear skies tremulous with golden and crimson hues. Observers of the December twilights were enthusiastic in praise of the charming views and glittering pageants that adorned the west after sunset. Twilight, or the illumination of the sky that begins before sunrise or continues after sunset, is an atmospheric phenomenon. It is caused by the reflection of sunlight to the observer from the upper regions of the earth's atmosphere, just as the sun shines on the summits of mountains after he has set to observers on the plains below. As the sun continues to drop below the horizon, the reflection decreases until it gradually ceases, and night begins in earnest. This point is reached when the sun is 18 degrees below the horizon. The duration of twilight varies with the season of the year, and the position on the earth's surface. In the latitude of 40 degrees, twilight at the Summer solstice, about June 20, lasts nearly two hours; at the Winter solstice, about Dec. 20, it lasts a little more than one hour and a half. Twilight lasts longer in higher latitudes, and the variation is greater. If there were no atmosphere, the scientist tells us, there would be no twilight. The darkness of midnight would immediately follow the shutting out of the sun, and would continue until the morning sunlight burst suddenly upon us. The weather conditions for January may not be as exceptional as twilight effects as December, but, none the less, if not so frequently, will the morning and evening twilights call forth tributes of admiration from the lovers of celestial beauty.

MIDSUMMER IN SOUTHERN HEMISPHERE.

The earth is in perihelion, or nearest the sun, on the 2d, at which time she will be 3,000,000 miles nearer the sun than when in aphelion, or her most distant point from the sun, on July 2. The result is that when the earth is at this point of her orbit the sun's diameter is the greatest, the earth moves the fastest, and her nearness to the sun tempers the severity of Winter. The sun's diameter is measured every day in the year, and when nearest the earth the increase in diameter is about 3 per cent., a variation too small to be detected without a telescope, and yet sufficient to represent the immense distance given above. The earth moves fastest at perihelion, for the sun's attraction is then strongest, and the greater his attraction the faster hustles old Mother Earth. Consequently the northern Winter, counting from autumnal equinox to vernal equinox, is seven days shorter than the northern Summer. This is the condition of affairs in the western hemisphere. The reverse takes place in the southern hemisphere, where it is now midsummer, and where the earth's perihelion increases the Summer heat. Thus the temperature in Australia and Southern Africa is higher than corresponding latitudes north of the equator. The southern Summer is therefore hotter and seven days shorter than the northern, while the southern Winter is both longer and colder.

Misty and various are the influences that sway the planet on which we dwell. Among the most interesting of all her movements is the one in which she accompanies the sun and his splendid retinue of worlds through the realms of space. For the sun and his system are rapidly hastening toward a point in the constellation of Hercules, called the apex of the sun's way. The earth participates in the motion. Every hour the sun sweeps onward 20,000 miles nearer the goal. It would seem that with this marvelous velocity we might soon get there, but so unmeasurable is the distance of the stars in this constellation that the sun and his system traveling at the present rate will require more than 1,000,000 years to reach the frontiers of Hercules. And yet the earth bends and bows in obedience to these mighty forces, and its inhabitants die in serene unconsciousness of the varying attractions which she is powerless to resist as she every year makes her grand circuit around the sun.

TWO NEW MOONS IN THE MONTH.

On the 8th the moon that came in with the new year reaches the phase of first quarter, on the 15th we have full moon, last quartering takes place on the 23d, while on the 30th we have the second new moon for the new year. The year opening with the new moon makes the exact number for the year twenty-nine, which is practically the age of the December moon when January comes in. This number, and the golden number for the year, which for 1900 is two, are quite important in Church calendars, and when one searches in the Prayer Book for them, are about as difficult to find as one's way through a Continental time-table. The month's conjunctions, in which moon and planets are interested, begin with a meeting with Mars, which is followed by a similar phenomenon on the last day of the month. On the 3d, Venus and Luna are at their closest, but the meeting lacks interest, owing to the distance of 6 degrees of blue intervening between the two. The moon occults Neptune on the 13th, but the representative of the seas is too faint for us to see his face, and so a view of this interesting celestial picture is denied us. On the 26th comes a meeting with Jupiter, followed a few hours later by a second occultation, and this time with Uranus, but, as before, the planet is too far distant to be an interesting performer on the celestial boards. On the 28th, Saturn and the moon are at their closest, and we find a third occultation for the month. This one the keen-eyed observer can see, although there are only two days left for the old moon to shine before the new moon comes in. Mercury on the 30th is in conjunction, but on this date we can see neither moon nor planet, and so we cannot invite our friends to witness the meeting.

MARS THE DISTINCTIVE PLANET.

To Mars belongs the place of distinction for the month, for he not only is twice in conjunction with the moon, but also has a similar meeting with the sun. At this last, which occurs on the 15th, late in the day, the planet passes from an evening to a morning star, in which group he continues the remainder of the year. In fact, he does not reach quadrature, half way on his road to opposition, until November, so that early risers will be able to find him in the east gradually increasing his distance from the sun for some months to come.

Venus still greets admiring eyes in the west soon after the sun has set. She is drawing further away from Old Sol and becoming more radiantly beautiful each successive night. As far as striking celestial phenomena for the month are concerned, she plays rather an unimportant part, but as long as we have her lovely face to gaze upon, the picture is quite complete in itself.

Neptune is an evening star, and, while now almost two hours behind the sun, he manages to reduce the interval by two hours before the month closes. While located at present near the limits of the constellation of the Bull, he is not near enough to any of the bright stars to have them indicate his whereabouts clearly enough to give us a definite idea just where to look for him.

Jupiter now rises some three hours or so earlier than the great orb of day, and one can get a splendid view of his bright face in the eastern heavens, if anything should so unfortunately occur to cause him to open his eyes before daylight. Next month Jupiter will have covered one-half the distance between conjunction and opposition, and in May we'll have him in all his glory rising as the sun is setting.

URANUS CLOSE TO THE MOON.

Uranus is less than a degree separated from the moon on the 26th, and it is always aggravating when these events occur to be denied the privilege of seeing the actors. It may, however, give us rather a more than usual correctness of idea as to where to look for the planet, if we succeed in fixing in our minds the appearance of the stars in the neighborhood.

Saturn has now become a morning star, and we find him in occultation with the moon's waning crescent on the 28th. The sun has hardly sufficiently released his hold on the planet just at present to give us a real good look at his face with unaided vision, and so we are once more to take the beauties of this meeting on faith and wait for the fulfillment of the promise of better things to come. Mercury remains evening star throughout the month, and on the 7th has a meeting with Saturn. This period of the planet's career is unhappily not one in which his light succeeds in marking the outlines of his disk in the overpowering rays of the sun.

RESTORING OLD PAINTINGS.

New York the American Centre for the Business—How the Work Is Done.

A woman purchased a picture the other day, and while it was being prepared for removal to her house the man who had it in charge had the misfortune to put his foot through it. To the uninitiated it would seem that the picture was ruined entirely, but it was sent to the repairers, and when it was returned it would have taken an expert to have told that it was not as good as when it was sold.

The work of renovating pictures is an important one, and there is an astonishing amount of work done in that line in New York. Pictures are sent here from all over the country, and there seems to be not much that cannot be done to them, except to make new pictures of them.

"If we could be Titians one day and Raphaels the next we might do that," said a man who knows all about this subject, "but aside from that there are many things that can be done to make good a picture that has been injured by ignorance and neglect, carelessness or vandalism. It is not difficult work to do, either. There are certain rules by which it is done, and then infinite care and patience are required, but the labor is chiefly mechanical.

"Paintings require plenty of light and air and warmth, and they will keep in good condition ordinarily, but with extremes of heat and cold they will suffer; and then people frequently allow them to become so incrusted with dirt that the picture looses all its beauties. They will have over a fine coat of varnish put on it which will eventually crack the paint. Chairs are among the greatest friends of the picture restorer, and often the picture is painted upon a bad medium, and then it has to be removed and remounted.

"A picture is not painted upon the linen just as it comes from the looms, but it is covered with several coats of paint before the artist goes to work. That should be mixed with good white lead, but if, instead of that, it is mixed with glue, the glue will dry after a time and crack the paint. In that case it is necessary to remove the picture to a canvas with a better medium. With ordinary wear and tear on a picture, it will need attention once in a while, and sometimes the artists themselves use bad mediums.

"You hear of pictures weeping tears of bitumen. Two of the largest portraits in the United States we had here at one time. They had been weeping these tears of bitumen until the shadows were all gone, and instead of warm, soft, rich tones, there was the cold glare of the canvas showing through. It may have been at one time that painters did not know any better, but when mistakes are made now, it is either because the artist has theories of his own in which he believes, or he doesn't care.

"Then bad varnish and bad varnishing are a cause of trouble. It is not every artist who knows how to varnish his own pictures. I know of instances where men do not. Then, of course, there is plain vandalism. For instance, there is that corner is a big three-paneled screen made from a large religious painting cut in three pieces, picture which looks as if it might be a good example of Murillo, though there is no signature. Some one probably had not much room, or he wanted a screen, so he had the picture cut and used it in this way. That is to be put together into a picture now. One of the very best portraits I ever had had been used for a fireboard for a generation. It was a beautiful portrait of one of the French Cardinals. That was a case where, perhaps, some of the ancestors of the family had good taste, and this portrait had descended to others who did not know its value. Perhaps they bought it at an auction sale. They may not have wanted to go to the expense of getting a frame for it if the one on it had become defaced, and so they put it to practical use as a fireboard.

"People come to me sometimes with big pictures which are too large for them and want me to cut them into smaller pictures. But I tell them I am a picture restorer, not a vandal.

"Some pictures have been so defaced by time and varnish that the signatures are lost, and when they are restored they are found to be very good and by good artists. There are professional men who make a practice of picking up old pictures on a chance of finding something valuable. It is a speculation, and the picture may or may not prove to be valuable. These men make a regular business of this, though ostensibly they are professional men.

"One picture sent to me to be restored proved to be two, and the better of these the owner had never seen. The artist had first painted a picture on canvas, then evidently didn't like it, and daubed it all over with paint until nothing of it was to be seen. Then he painted a picture on paper and mounted that on the other side. I was to restore the painting on paper. But in working over it I discovered a bit of red on the canvas back. I wondered what that was, removed a little of the paint, and saw that there was a picture there. Then all the paint had to be removed very carefully so as not to injure that of the painting itself, and there was revealed a second painting much better than the first. The one on paper was removed, mounted on another canvas, and there were two pictures, instead of one.

"Some canvases are not sufficiently taut on the stretcher, and then there is a constant contraction and expansion, and it is not difficult to see what will be the eventual result to the painting. There is always plenty of this work to be done. Pictures are sent here from Texas, Nebraska, Florida, from all over the country, though the greatest amount of work is on pictures that are here in the city.

"Am I ever surprised to find what good pictures people have? No, I am surprised to find the great number of bad pictures people have. There is an enormous number of bad pictures. Old families sometimes have the funniest old pictures. They may be copies or they don't know what they are. That, of course, does not include family portraits, for they have a value of their own, aside from the intrinsic value of the painting."

NEW CHURCH ON BROADWAY.

Manhattan Congregational Church Buys Site at Seventy-sixth Street.

The Manhattan Congregational Church, of which the Rev. Henry A. Stimson is pastor, has just purchased, through Brokers Slawson & Hobbs, a site for a new edifice on upper Broadway. The plot has a frontage of 80 feet on the east side of Broadway, beginning 26 feet 4 inches north of Seventy-sixth Street, and a depth of 134 feet 2 inches, with an "L" fronting 25 feet on the north side of Seventy-sixth Street, and contains about four full lots. The seller of the property is Charles F. Hoffman.

Early in the Spring work will be begun on an edifice which will cover the entire plot, and will be one of the handsomest of the new churches on the upper west side. The Manhattan Congregational Church's present place of worship is on Eighty-third Street, near Broadway.

Flushing Soldiers' Memorial Ready.

The testimonial to the soldiers and sailors of Flushing who went to the front in the Spanish-American war has been finished, and the public presentation will take place in the armory of the Seventeenth Separate Company on Jan. 16. The testimonial is in the form of a set of resolutions, which have been engrossed and mounted in a fine oak and gilt frame.

ALABAMA'S LEADING CITY

Birmingham's Population Grows 2,100 Per Cent. in Ten Years.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Dec. 30.—When the census enumerator comes to Birmingham next year and collects for the Government the facts and figures required to make up the exhibit of the city's development in ten years he will secure some indisputable material, a surprising array of figures to show the increase of population and the growth in industrial activity, but there will be much about Birmingham that cannot be properly included in a census. What is more important and satisfactory to the citizens of the place and to the neighborhood is that the exhibit that must be made of this now healthily busy town is that it will illustrate a condition in one city of the South that is bound to become a commoner condition all over that section of the country.

Ensley City, about which your correspondent has given some information, and which he has spoken of as a "show" city, is not enjoying a monopoly of the prosperity in which the Birmingham district is sharing without too much proclamation of the fact, a prosperity that will, it is believed, last as long as there is any demand for iron manufactured at prices with which Alabama is convinced none of her rivals can compete. The City of Birmingham had in 1880 a population of 2,000. The census taken in 1900 will find in and near Birmingham something like 100,000 people. Within the incorporated limits of the city there are now something like 45,000 inhabitants. Avondale, one of the suburbs, has 4,000 inhabitants. East Lake, an unincorporated suburb, boasts of 4,000 population. Woodlawn, also unincorporated, has a population of 3,500. East and North Birmingham, with 2,000 population, are unincorporated, like Elyton, Smithfield, West End, and Powderly, with 5,500 population all told. Pratt City, outstripped in the race for importance by Ensley, has still 5,000 inhabitants. Ensley has anywhere between 5,000 and 10,000. Bessemer has within its corporate limits 8,000 workers and their families, and Gate City and Irondale add up 2,000 inhabitants. The footing that gives the whole population as 83,000 is, I am assured by some of the men who dislike overdrawn statements, too far below 100,000 to be reliable.

CAUSE OF THE RAPID GROWTH.

What is it that has brought all this population to this place and its neighborhood? Not the desire to give Birmingham a reputation for rapid growth. The people who suffered from the overpushing of the early days of the city have learned that there is nothing but distress in "booming." It may be stated with perfect confidence that the backbone of the improvement of Birmingham has been the actual development of the marvelous mineral resources found in the immediate neighborhood, favoring the economical and rapid production of iron and steel. To get the ore and coal out of the hills and the pig iron out of the ore required laborers. To feed and clothe the laborers shops well supplied with food and clothing became necessary and profitable. All classes of artisans were needed to provide and equip houses and business places. The incoming of money and the necessity of providing channels of business brought banks. The whole march of civilization was soon established with representatives of each class in the line.

See what has taken place under the clouded skies of Birmingham in a few short months. During the year ending July 1, 1899, $3,600,000 was employed in starting some fifteen business concerns indispensable to the growth and prosperity and comfort of the city and its suburbs. The Alabama Steel and Shipbuilding Company began operations with a capital of $1,000,000. The Alabama Steel and Wire Company, with $2,000,000 capital; the Birmingham Investment Company, with $30,000 capital, and other companies in the manufacture of lumber, electricity, ice, woodwork, oil, flour, and conveyance supplies, all contributed to make up the amount invested as stated. Nearly $1,000,0000 was authorized to be expended, and has been in large part spent, in improving works already in operation. It is plain that building has been active to even the most casual observer, and it is not difficult to believe the report that $1,500,000 was spent in a year in the erection of new buildings, for dwellings, 247 of them in Birmingham, at a cost of about $1,000,000; 500 in Ensley, at a cost of $350,000, and many in the several suburbs enumerated in a prior paragraph. The banking capital in August last was $1,590,000 and the bank clearings in 1898 were $23,777,899. For the first six months of 1899 they were $14,750,865, and the showing for the last six months undoubtedly will be better.

MONTHLY AMOUNT OF WAGES PAID.

In popular estimation a "boom" is something like a balloon, a thing composed largely of wind. But wind will not sustain the hungry laborer. Only employment and pay will draw and keep the men to whom labor is a serious matter, for which they must have regular and prompt compensation. It is stated that there are now in the Birmingham district something like 35,000 laborers. To these wage earners is paid out monthly about $1,560,000. This is an increase over the number of men employed a year ago of 15 per cent., and the wages paid to labor have been increased something like an average of 20 per cent. That there is work to do and money coming from it, is evident from the condition of the street railways, which run frequently and in a crowded state most of the time over a hundred miles of line. Like the cars on the steam roads, they have their separate compartments for whites and blacks, each sacred to the use of the color assigned to it. The Ensley line is more meets the demands of the traffic in the crowded hours than do the railroads, surface and elevated, in New York City, and the growling is quite as audible and persistent as that heard in the metropolis.

Jefferson County is at night a glow of fire, belching from furnaces and coke ovens. From a high point the face of the earth would suggest something uncanny, but most of the fire proceeds from innumerable coke ovens, busy now as they never have been busy before, endeavoring to meet the constant demand for coke for the furnaces. In the county alone there were recently pretty nearly 4,000 ovens, operated by different corporations and now not quite able to supply the growing needs of the district. These ovens can produce nearly 2,000,000 tons of coke a year. The iron ore that the coke is used to turn into pig is chiefly of the red fossiliferous variety, inexhaustible in supply, and, like the coal, almost at Birmingham's doors. An idea of the abundance of the coal supply was noticed at Ensley, where the shaft is within a thousand yards of the new steel mill of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railway Company. Mr. Shook, in charge of the steel plant, said that the supply as reported by the engineer of the company, will last at the present rate of consumption for 10,000 years without danger of exhaustion.

ENORMOUS OUTPUT OF PIG IRON.

With pig iron in demand, and every nerve and muscle strained to produce it rapidly, the production of the State will in 1899 reach far beyond the 1,026,559 tons reported as the production in 1898. There is great wealth for the iron producers of the Birmingham district in the production of pig iron alone, but the recent opening of the Tennessee steel plant in Ensley, and the advancement of each ton of iron from $15 a ton to from $30 to $50 a ton in value, by its conversion into steel blooms or steel in other and more advanced forms, is an assurance of development to the city that can scarcely be overestimated.

Public spirit is being awakened by commercial success. The arrested development following the premature "boom" of a few years ago is being taken up. With all the rush of business, the appearance of the city is not to be long overlooked. Clubs and socities having for their object the stimulation of civic pride and social improvement are doing their part to make evident the willingness and ability of the builders of Birmingham to make it worthy to be ranked with the best cities of its population. The evidences of this reawakened public spirit are seen in the columns of The Age-Herald, the leading newspaper. Mr. E. W. Barrett, who became the controlling spirit in this concern two years ago, after a valuable training on an Atlanta paper and an experience at Washington that developed a striking natural aptitude for journalistic work, expresses the utmost confidence in the public spirit of the city to meet the highest expectations of those who hope to see Birmingham a second Manchester, not only in its productive capacity, but also in its all-round activity and in its evidences of culture.

POLITICS OF THE COMMUNITY.

Birmingham is a democratic city. It does not take one long to find that out, or to find that its interest in national politics runs toward a policy that will help Birmingham. Several political questions give concern to the people second only to that felt in the development of the natural resources of the district. The politicians and the voters seem to be interested in these questions in a rather confusing order as to importance. In a Democratic city, in the State of Alabama, it would be reasonable, perhaps, to discover that the chief interest was to be discovered in the nominations and the election in the Presidential campaign of 1900. I can only try to give the Birmingham feeling on that subject by repeating the talk of a well-known Alabama Democrat whom I met here.

"Alabama," he said, "will send a Bryan delegation to the National Convention. We expect to see Bryan nominated again. No; I did not say that I wanted to see him elected. Let us name him in obedience to the persistent Democratic demand that he shall be tried again. For the nomination for Vice President I would suggest some young and confident man from the East, as we cannot get Sewall again, offering it, perhaps, to George Fred Williams. Personally, I would like to see these nominations on a ticket with the motto 'Soak them good.' None of the old politicians expect to see Bryan elected. This town has been described as being full of 'McKinley Democrats.' There are some of them here. They do not care to try any experiments that may result in the lifting of this blessed cloud of smoke from the furnaces and coke ovens. We must stand by the organization, however; that way lies our political safety at home. That's all."

This suggestion of perfunctory support of Bryan, coming from the man who intimated it to be the prospect, would not be made in alluding to the coming contest for Governor. Joseph F. Johnston is now Governor of Alabama. He is a candidate for Senator to succeed Senator John T. Morgan. He is esteemed as a man of great business ability, but he is not a popular man. Some of his opponents in the Democratic Party say he is a demagogue. His last annual message to the Legislature certainly did not lack in the quality of self-appreciation, and his critics say the Governor might have made himself more popular if he had assumed less to himself less of the credit that might have been shared with others. He does not lack courage and a certain sort of audacity. But Senator Morgan challenged admiration by the display of a quality of nerve that quite shocked his younger and even less audacious competitor. A joint debate was asked for by Johnston at the beginning of the Senatorial campaign, which has begun. In this first joint meeting Johnston appealed to a prevailing Democratic inclination to restrict the colored vote of the State by law. Morgan did a bolder thing. He came out flat-footed in favor of the suppression of the black vote. Johnston was amazed and annoyed. The joint-debate programme was interrupted by the return to Washington of Senator Morgan. Since then statements have been made to show that Johnston is leading in the competition for delegates to conventions to choose members of the Legislature. Morgan, at Washington, sneers indifferently at the reports of Johnston successes as he would more "picket firing" preceding an engagement, and says the battle line is yet to be arranged.

THE GUBERNATORIAL CONTEST.

Gov. Johnston's place is to be fought for by several aspirants to the place of Chief Executive of the State. Representative Jesse F. Stallings of the Second District, living at Greenville, hopes to be nominated, and a nomination will mean an election. Gen. C. M. Shelley, formerly a Representative in Congress, and a politician of many resources, also seeks the nomination. He directed the last fight against Kolb in a campaign in which Kolb insisted that he had been elected and was cheated out of his office, an opinion in which he and the Legislature did not agree. Shelley is familiar with the State, as none of his competitors may be assumed to be. There will be other candidates, and Gen. Wheeler may be of the number. However indifferent any and all of them may be about the Presidential candidate of the Democratic Party, they all feel the utmost interest in maintaining the ascendancy of the Democratic Party in the State. It does not appear that Gov. Johnston can help either of the men who would be his successor. As a matter of fact, he has some matters to clear up on his own account about sales of public lands that promise to add to his difficulties in undertaking to defeat Senator Morgan as a candidate for re-election.

Not only in Birmingham but in other places in Alabama, it was found that the advocacy of the nomination of Col. Bryan for President savored of the perfunctory. The feeling among Democrats, who retain their admiration for Bryan's brilliant qualities was that he may command the nomination, but cannot inspire again the enthusiasm he infused into his party in 1896. With free silver regarded as nonsense by a large number of Alabam Democrats, and as dead by nearly all, and with a very decided difference of opinion as to expansion, it is difficult for Democrats to see upon what issue Bryan can hopefully appeal to the country. "It will not do," said one Democrat, and a friend of Bryan's at that, "to reach out for straws and make a straw platform. I do not believe that the Democratic Party will hope to win with a candidate who has tired everybody out and who cannot find a platform of real planks upon which to stand as a bidder for public confidence."

S. H. G. STEWART BANKRUPT.

Wall Street Broker Has Firm Liabilities of $282,111.

Stanley H. G. Stewart, doing business as Stewart & Co., bankers and brokers at 40 Wall Street, filed a petition in bankruptcy yesterday. The petition was sworn to by Mr. Stewart on Dec. 28, in Washington, D. C. William H. Van Steenbergh is the attorney. The schedules give the liabilities as a firm at $282,111, and those of Mr. Stewart individually as $41,859. The firm assets are nominally $1,213,857 and individual $1,000.

Mr. Stewart was formerly with Emerson, McMillan & Co., and in August, 1895, formed the firm of Stewart & Co., to trade in railroad securities, manufacturing companies, and assist in reorganizing railroads. His son, Emerson M. G., was a partner up to June 9, 1898, since which time the petitioner has carried on the business alone under the firm style. Mr. Stewart became interested in a number of enterprises, among which were the Commercial Gas Company of New York, the Morley Acetylene Gas Company, of which concerns he was Treasurer, and the St. Lawrence Power Company of Messina, N. Y.

The firm assets consist of $390,900 stocks and bonds of the Commercial Gas Company, the Morley Acetylene Gas Company, and the Union Railway Company of Kansas City, Mo.; $650,000 claims for damages, of which $500,000 is against Charles A. Moreing and $150,000 against the St. Lawrence Construction Company; $170,615 debts due, the largest being $123

At the Play and With the Players

The best strawberries, I am afraid, will be found at the top of this basket. There are two admirable episodes, or parts of episodes, in "The Cowboy and the Lady." In the first act the lovely heroine (and nobody with eyes to see can doubt the loveliness of this heroine) is saved from an imaginary death, off stage, by the hero, who is an American Lord Arthur Chilton in top boots. She faints, and in that condition is brought on the scene, picturesquely, and when she comes to herself she tries to discover which of three stage cowboys performed the heroic act.

These three cowboys, you must first be told, have been directed by their boss, Teddy, who is the hero, not to tell that he rescued the lady. The command strikes the audience, I fancy, much as it strikes the aforesaid boys.

"You understand me?" asks Teddy.

"Well," replies one of the three, "we do and we don't."

That is just the way the audience feel. They understand that Teddy is "leading up" to a situation, but they do not understand why the author of so fine and natural a play as "Barbara Frietchie" should make him do it quite so disingenuously. But the situation, as I have said, is worth something.

The lady is sure that one of the three dear, dirty, rum-swilling, foul-mouthed cowboys, bless their hearts, saved her; that one of their arms is that arm that seemed like the arm of God as it came over the edge of the precipice just before she fainted. By the way, there are more references to the Almighty, first and last, in "The Cowboy and the Lady" than there are in an ordinary Bible lesson.

So Jessica Weston questions the men, and they tell her they have decided not to reveal the hero's identity. Wherefore she ceremoniously kisses each one of them in turn, while the real hero looks on from behind a set rock, and when he puts in a meek word she snubs him.

It makes a novel and pretty scene, with an undercurrent of pathos to offset its humor. To be sure, there seems to be no very good reason why Jessica should treat Teddy so badly, and misunderstand him so persistently. I seem to remember that when her predecessors, in this particular and piquant phase of romance, snubbed their lovers, Marguerite in "The Romance of a Poor Young Man," for instance, and Magdalen Atherleigh in "False Shame," there was a stronger semblance of reason either in the pictured circumstances or in their traits of character than Mr. Fitch has tried to or has been able to secure in this play. But, though the illusion is therefore rather weak here, the entertainment one derives from the episode is not the less appreciable.

The other scene or bit that has a powerful effect is just after the murder, in Act II. It is not nice. One of the Russians or Scandinavians might have imagined it. The girl who keeps the concert hall is about to elope with Weston, when her half-breed lover shoots Weston. The stage is in darkness. The girl hurries to her room up a flight of stairs in the background and locks the door. The murderer, unable to escape any other way, tries to gain admittance to her room. The girl refuses to open the door till he cries out that if she does not he will break it down and kill her. "If I open the door," she asks, "will you swear not to hurt me?" He swears, and the half-breed goes into the room and out of danger. This little bit of realism ought to end the act. It is a pity that Teddy must believe he thinks Jessica has turned murderess and declare himself murderer to save her. The curtain falls after the illusion has been sadly strained.

It is a great mistake to suppose that this play is objected to because it is a drama of Western life, because it deals with coarse characters, because it is melodramatic. Its fault is that it lacks any sort of defined character, any vraisemblance that is more than pictorial. The first act is of a better quality than either of the others, but even in that one does not feel that the characters are actual and possible human beings.

What a horrible and needless incident that lynching of Midge's father is! The "boys" have just been stringing up the old man and they return to pet the girl and put quarters in a box whenever they swear in her presence. Now, I ask, does anybody who sees the play quite catch the meaning of this—that the blood of Midge's father is on the hands of her dear friends while they are caressing her? I do not believe it.

Mr. Fitch has shown the ability, to a very uncommon degree, in his "Nathan Hale," and especially in his lovely "Barbara Frietchie," to create atmosphere and a sense of reality in a dramatic work. The persons in his play at the Criterion are alive, even the least important of them. The persons in "The Cowboy and the Lady" are the puppets of ordinary melodrama, and so far from gaining strength from the dramatist's unusual facility of expression and his play of humor, those qualities in this instance are of positive detriment to the play. They help to make it caviare to the throng that is eager for "straight" melodrama, and they do not make it satisfying to the audiences at the Knickerbocker Theatre Mr. Goodwin is now offering it to. Of this I am quite certain.

Each night I have seen the fall of the curtain on what should be the strongest scene of "The Cowboy and the Lady"—the arrest of Teddy for murder at the end of Act II., I have heard a mere spluttering of perfunctory applause. The first night the passage of floral tributes down the aisles was the signal for loud calls for Goodwin. That applause was not for the play. The next night, after a faint show of handclapping, the audience relapsed into silence. Yet after Act I. each night the applause was hearty and prolonged.

In the recurrence of the old device of a murder trial in Act III., the best point is in the unwilling testimony of the waif Midge against the young man who has befriended her. The note of pathos is struck there. One of Mr. Fitch's most extravagant ideas is embodied in the examination of the widow, when Teddy, who is conducting his own defense, asks her, for the purpose of proving that she has no cause to shield him, if she loves him, and she replies that she does. Teddy is astonished and delighted, while the chain of evidence against him is complete. The inherent improbability of the incident need scarcely be pointed out. That any woman can accept this either as a true transcript from life or a poetic equivalent for it I will not believe. Moreover, when this man, within an hour or so of the gallows, hears the answer, he begins to caper about the court room like a clown. If, as Mr. Charles Frohman has lately remarked, "romantic melodrama is, in a sort, burlesque," then this is, clearly enough, romantic melodrama. But it does not seem right. The suspense, the throb, the thrill, are all lacking, and what is left is of small moment. Now, that is a true and unbiased account of my feeling about "The Cowboy and the Lady."

The performance is all of a good quality. The pathos and humor of Midge are very happily expressed by Minnie Dupree, and Burr McIntosh makes the hulking Joe as agreeable as possible, which is to say that he accomplishes, by the force of his personality, a difficult task. Miss Estelle Mortimer and Miss Gertrude Gheen as the pianist of the dance hall and its lessee, (the former representing an extremely queer and kindergarten-kind of an idea about the women in mining camp concert halls,) are felicitously placed, while Thomas Oberle, as the impossible Indian of stereotyped melodrama, and Clarence Handyside, as the weather-beaten old jurist on the bench, act their parts well.

Mr. Goodwin's rare dramatic talent is manifested intermittently. The rôle is not capable or being crystallized into a perfectly symmetrical impersonation. But Goodwin's dramatic instinct is unerring, and when Teddy has a mood to express, the expression is flawless and virile. He never permits the fun to degenerate into the mere burlesque, upon the verge of which the author totters, excepting in the bit near the end, already described, wherein he could not help himself if he tried. His expression of tenderness in his demeanor toward Midge, his denotement of mingled horror, surprise, suspicion, and sudden resolution in the climax of Act II., the dignity and earnestness of his delivery of his defense to the jury, are all admirable.

Maxine Elliott never looked handsomer and nobody, I verily believe, could make this cardboard heroine of Fitch's seem more nearly real than she does. What Jessica Weston is doing in a mining camp, in her silks and pearls, she does not help us to understand. How could she? But there is sprightliness, where that is called for, and quiet dignity in her acting, and grace in her every motion.

The new burletta Mr. Knowles has produced at the Fifth Avenue Theatre is continuously vivacious, or nearly so. Perhaps fifteen minutes could be safely cut out of the first half of it. But I suppose that to "let well enough alone" is as wise a maxim in theatricals as in other trades, and "Three Little Lambs" seemed to be well enough with last week's audiences.

As for Mr. Barnet's libretto, I do not know quite what to make of it. There is no wit. There is not a gleam of originality. The golf jokes indicate that Barnet does not know a stymie from a foursome and has simply taken some catalogue of golf goods and selected terms and the names of things haphazard. The "satire" that relates to banking methods, to "advanced" women, and such other topics as the Boston dramatist has chosen to hold up to ridicule, is all equally vapid. There is hardly a quotable line in the dialogue.

Yet everything goes well. The comedians, with an assortment of stock jokes, keep intelligent looking men and women in the happiest possible humor. Now, without doubt, some measure of the success is due to Mr. Barnet. The libretto must have some occult but practical value.

The production is scenically handsome and the music of three several composers sounds very well, but on the musical side of the performance I may not dwell, which, in the circumstances, is just as well. Adele Ritchie, William Philp, Nellie Braggins, Clara Palmer, and William T. Carleton are the principal singers, and of these Mr. Carleton has the best musical reputation and deserves it. His bearing is always graceful and with his long experience it seems to me he might find a new and profitable field in spoken comedy.

The largest personal hit in the performance, however, has been made by Marie Cahill, though Miss Braggins acts her comic rôle in a becomingly frolicsome way and shows a keen sense of humor. Miss Cahill was notably successful at the Casino a few years ago in a dull piece called "The Gold Bug," which not even her high spirits could save from ruin, and latterly, I believe, she has been hidden somewhere in the late Augustin Daly's company. She has come in for her rights now, and as a preposterous female thief, whose husband is a pickpocket, while their pal is a bank President, she fairly bubbles over with humor. She is ably assisted by Edmund Lawrence, who makes Francis Wilson his model, and by Raymond Hitchcock, who occasionally falls into the manner of the ineffable Dan Daly. The acrobatic skill and comic personality of young Tom Hadaway, grandson of old Tom, of cherished memory, are also useful in "Three Little Lambs."

Miss Millward's excellent acting of the preposterous Princess of Vasungia, the land of avatism and twaddle, makes the new play at the Empire Theatre worth while. Miss Millward is always perfectly sure of her effects. Her taste, her sense of artistic proportion, diction, gesture, posing, are always exactly right. How she might succeed now in one of the great rôles of the old repertory it would be rash to venture a prediction. She was thoroughly effective as Tennyson's Elinor some years ago, but the demands of that rôle were comparatively slight.

Her personality scarcely seems to suit Lady Macbeth, yet I should like to see her try the rôle, especially in the profoundly sad second and fourth scenes of the third act, and the sleep-walking episode. Lady Macbeth's part is pretty strong meat in the first act and the murder scene. But whether or not Miss Millward could rise to the few great rôles of drama—the permanent drama—she is certainly an actress of uncommon talent and, within the range to which she has lately been restricted, of unerring skill.

Nothing of the sentiment, the humor, the passion, of Mr. Esmond's play misses expression at her hands, unless it is something that cannot be expressed. Why the Princess should call her waiting woman's stylographic pen her own, why she should mention stylographic pens at all, why in a country where a bicycle is regarded with amazement, though they have a cheap cab service in the heart of the forest, they should have stylographic pens at all—these are things the finest interpretative talent cannot make understandable.

It is too bad for this little cockney actor and playmaker to cross the Atlantic to give us a new lesson in subtle humor. This is really worse than The London Chronicle's salad and spinach story. I am given to understand that in the climax of the third act of "My Lady's Lord," when Doura has made a splendid impression on the court as the avenger of her own honor, and Jack Martin intrudes to say, "What rubbish! Pack up and come to North Audley Street," the last touch of exquisite humor has been reached.

That is to say the old fault of guying one's self, which dramatic authors always used to avoid even in farce and burlesque, has now become a virtue. The idea of "My Lady's Lord" which one derives from the published announcement of the author's purpose, is a gentle dramatic satire in which a practical modern man is exhibited as the lover and husband of a Princess of Romance. The idea is very old, but always pleasing. It is akin to Mark Twain's in his yarn of the Connecticut man at the Court of Arthur, to De Forrest's in his once familiar story of an isle peopled with Puritans off the New England coast. But Mr. Esmond's people in Vasungia seem to represent no comprehensible idea at all. They are neither ancient nor modern, romantic nor practical, and much that they say and do is merely fuss and chatter. Unless, indeed, Mr. Esmond's meaning is too occult, his humor too subtle, for our clayey understanding.

Esmond as a dramatist is a puzzle, anyhow. There was much constructive skill and dramatic feeling in his farfetched but actable piece, "The Courtship of Leonie," which failed at the Lyceum some years ago. In "One Summer's Day" there were some delightful passages, but here the construction was abominable and the interest flagged in spite of some very good acting. The trouble seems to be that Esmond cannot quite express the ideas that come to him. As an actor he has acquired a good command of stage technique. He is ambitious, he has cultivation and natural wit. But whether or not "My Lady's Lord" runs three weeks or seven Mr. Esmond will do well to quit his fooling and try his hand at a serious, practical play for the edification and entertainment of the plain folks to whom all subtlety is annoying and who must be relied upon to support commercial enterprises like the contemporary theatre.

We all know, who keep in touch with theatrical matters, that Mr. Esmond has his Ibsenish moods, but so have some of the rest of us, moods when all the earth seems blue and we fairly loathe the memory of our grandfathers. But the literary and artistic products of those moods are not merchandise. Nor are too subtle humor and overelaborate satire.

Still, Mr. Charles Frohman has not only accepted "My Lady's Lord" and set it on the stage of his handsome and comfortable theatre with beautiful pictures, but has constituted himself its defender and interpreter of its mystery to a callow and dull-witted generation. Wherefore may Mr. Esmond chuckle and declare that we who review theatricals do not know everything, which is, indeed, not short of the truth. The manager who has kept "Miss Hobbs" on the stage for four months may yet transform "My Lady's Lord" into a thing the children will cry for.

As a medium for the excellent acting of Miss Millward it has, thus far, served a good purpose. Since her engagement at the Empire we have not been permitted to see her in any other part exhibiting so much of her range of expression. Mr. Faversham has a much easier task as the modern and practical young Englishman who whistles a coster song as he pursues the lady of his love to the very heart of oblivion. His touch is unfailingly light, and he does all that could be done for the character. That excellent comedian Sidney Herbert is also noteworthy in the performance for the zeal he bestows upon a portrayal of a small part, while Mr. Standing, Mr. Wheelock, Miss Blanche Burton, and Miss Sara Perry are also as effective as possible.

One thing may be said in favor of "My Lady's Lord." It is perfectly decent in every line and situation. So is "Three Little Lambs." As for "The Cowboy and the Lady," in that the love of a bachelor for another man's wife is treated of in a most innocuous manner, and the only offense is in the swear words with which Mr. Fitch's dialogue is studded.

These, I fancy, were put in to satisfy a prevailing demand in social life. It has been quite the thing lately to tell swearword stories in dinner table talk. A story containing an "Oh H—l!" or an oath with the name of the Deity attached is considered delightfully piquant. Nevertheless, to full-grown men foul barroom talk is objectionable in the theatre. Still, if Mr. Goodwin and Mr. Fitch believe that "the matinée girl," Mr. Archer's bogie, demands oaths they are not to be rashly condemned for catering to her taste.

Personally, I regard the return to town of Lewis Dockstader, with a new joke and a good minstrel troupe, as a boon. One who goes to the theatre much finds that there are certain comedians and jesters of the stage to whose humor he is particularly impressionable. Some of the most renowned funny men of my time have not seemed funny to me, but as a humorist I have always found Dockstader as irresistible in his way as Davidge and Harry Beckett were in theirs. Among minstrels he ranks in my mind with Unsworth. Then he did have one brand-new joke Christmas afternoon. And is not the show gorgeous?

THIS WEEK'S NEW BILLS.

"Chris and the Wonderful Lamp" and Schweighofer in Two New Roles.

At Hammerstein's Victoria to-morrow night a new musical extravaganza called "Chris and the Wonderful Lamp" will be performed for the first time in New York under the direction of Messrs. Klaw and Erlanger and "Ben" D. Stevens. The piece was written by Glen Macdonough and John Philip Sousa composed the music, which is said to be in his best vein. The plot is founded on a recent short story, but is largely original. "Chris" is in three acts and seven scenes.

The time is the present, and the action begins in this city. Young Chris buys at a sale of curios an old lamp, which he casually rubs when a Genie appears dutifully at his side. This is Aladdin's old Genie brought quite up to date. Aladdin has been asleep on the Island of Etheria for some centuries, and the Genie has been taking in the sights all over the world. Now he is ready to do Chris's bidding. Chris loves Fanny, who has been torn from his arms and sent to boarding school by a mere parent. He now orders the Genie to transplant the whole school to Aladdin's Island. When they get there, by way of San Francisco and the Pacific Ocean, Aladdin wakes up and takes a hand in the proceedings.

One of the scenic features will be a panorama 220 feet long representing the ocean voyage. The cast will include Edna Wallace Hopper as Chris, Jerome Sykes as the obliging Genie, and John Page, Randolph Curry, Herbert Carter, Charles H. Drew, Frank Todd, Ethel Irene Stewart, Emily Beaupré, Mabella Baer, Nellie Lynch, Edna Hunter, Viola Jewell, and Stella Madison.

The principal songs are, "The Patter of the Shingle," "Fanny," "The Hump-backed Whale," "I'm a High-Toned Genie," "He Couldn't Do a Thing Without Me," "The College of Hoop-de-roo," "Torch Tep Was the Boy for Me," "In Poster-Land," "Etheria," and "The Lay of the Mechanical Doll." "In Poster-Land" is a musical skit on the late eccentricities of decorative art—green moons and red grass. In "He Couldn't Do a Thing Without Me" Mr. Sykes relates the marvelous things he has done for those who owned the lamp.

Felix Schweighofer will appear in two new rôles at the Irving Place Theatre this week. To-morrow night he will be seen as old Philip Klapproth in Karl Lauff's famous farce, "Pension Schoeller." Klapproth who dwells in the country, goes to Berlin and tells his wild nephew that the desire of his life is to see the interior of a lunatic asylum. It occurs to the nephew that time and trouble may be saved by simply taking his uncle to his boarding house and telling him that is a lunatic asylum. Like most boarding houses, it is enough like one to make the risk small. So old Philip is taken to Schoeller's pension and told the peculiarities of each patient and warned how to conduct himself, while the unsuspecting boarders, knowing him as a rich old person, try to be as agreeable as they can, with ludicrous results.

Thursday night "Gypsfigur" will be the play. This is a three-act musical farce by Taube and Roth, in which Schweighofer appears as a retired merchant. Among the actors in the Austrian comedian's support this week will be Wilhelmine Schlueter, Elly Collmer, Julius Strobl, von Seyffertitz, and Anna Leonardi.

IN THE AUDIENCE.

"I have been a regular and confirmed first nighter in the New York theatres," said an elderly looking man who still boasted of reasonably good health and spirits, "for more than twenty years—never mind how many more. No, I do not get tired of the theatre. But lately, I have begun to grow a little weary of the noise of first nights. I think I better enjoy seeing Monday night's new play now on Wednesday night, for instance, in the company of nice, quiet, modestly dressed folks.

"A midweek audience at one of the theatres near to the heart of things in this metropolis, the Knickerbocker or the Empire, or Daly's, always gives the lie, it seems to me, to the favorite taunt of a few old fellows that nobody who is anybody goes to the theatre nowadays. In a first-night audience you see the same faces for years. Of course, they change. There are very few first nighters now who can remember as many first nights as I can. But there are a few who outdate me, and there are a score perhaps who have been devoted first nighters for fully fifteen years.

"Who are they? Well, that's a hard question to answer. There are some whom everybody knows. No, that number does not include the newspaper critics. But I never take a youngster to the theatre with me, and I am very fond of taking youngsters to first nights, that he does not kindly point out to me sundry jurists, brokers, and merchants who are habitual theatregoers. There are in the first-night multitude, however, many whose faces are familiar to all the other first nighters of their period, but whose names nobody seems to know. Come to think of it, I suppose I'm one of that sort myself.

"For five years I wondered who a handsome lady accompanied to every performance by either one or two good-looking gentlemen was. They were always on hand, the lady and either one or both of the gentlemen, yet for a long while they never spoke to anybody, and nobody seemed to notice them. Then I noticed that they were gradually acquiring a bowing and handshaking acquaintance among the first nighters who are of sufficient importance for people to want to bow to and shake hands with.

"After a year or two I noticed them shaking hands with a man-about-town whom I knew well, and I seized the first opportunity to ask him who they were. He said frankly that he didn't know, but he thought they were nice, polite folks. Some time afterward I noticed another of my acquaintances saluting them, and I put the question to him. The answer was much the same. Lately they have dropped out of sight. They, believe me, were thoroughly representative New York first nighters—nobody in particular.

"Yes, maybe the first-night audience of this era is a little more showy than it used to be. There is more money in circulation. There is a much larger proportion of richly overdressed women in a first-night audience than there was in the late seventies. It sometimes seems to me, too, that in spite of the signs of triumph which nowadays accompany almost every first performance, no matter how poor the play may be, the first nighters of the present are much harder to please than those of the past. But the fault may be with me, you know. I'm getting on in years.

"Change in taste? I don't know much about that. I can tell you one thing for certain. The audiences of this hour will stand more of profanity and less of libidinous suggestion in stage dialogue than their predecessors would. For instance, a quarter of a century ago, and somewhat later than that, 'The School for Scandal' was acted at Wallack's with the celebrated scandal scene just as Sheridan wrote it. Not a word was omitted in the four speeches of Crabtree and Mrs. Candour. This in spite of the fact that tea-table conversation in the sixties and seventies was much more restrained and formal than it is now among polite folks. The only 'cuts' Daly made in the comedy when he revived it in 1891 were in this scene. At Wallack's, however much refined women and decent men may have suffered in mind while the scandal scene was on, no feelings were spared. Yet I can well remember the objections made in those days to the use of 'd——n,' then the only profane oath admitted to stage dialogue, in the revivals of old comedy. The 'd——ns' were frequently stricken out. Stoddart used to say the word so as to make a parson laugh, but it used to be thought proper to shake one's head gravely even while laughing at his funny oaths.

"Nowadays all this is changed. The profanity tolerated in a certain piece now current in a Broadway house would have filled the theatre with hisses in those days.

"How do I account for it? I don't try to. Decay of religious spirit? Well, I cannot follow you as far as that. But you may rest assured that the proportion of indecency in the plots and action of the plays, apart from the dialogue, does not change much. In the matter of undress in operetta and burlesque, the change began with the introduction of French opera bouffe as far back as 1867. But adultery has always been the commonest of stage themes, and even the old farces were built upon it. Of course, the pessimistic, naturalistic, hopeless drama of heredity and disease did not use to have vogue. But it has none now, has it?"

A TALK WITH MARY SHAW.

This has been a great week for children at the Broadway Theatre. The Play of "Ben-Hur" has so many pictorial effects that they can appreciate them where they do not take in the plot of the play, and it is one that the most careful mother feels will be a benefit to the child, so in this holiday week they have been given the advantage of it. It makes one think of the Christmas pantomimes in England looking down from the stage on matinée days, Mary Shaw says. The audiences at the play, exclusive of the little people, have a rapt manner of following it which is not unchildlike, and it affects people who have strong religious tendencies often in a way that is a surprise to them. It does even the people who are brought in touch with the dominant religious element on the stage. It was between the matinée and evening performance one day last week that Miss Shaw was talking about this peculiarity and her own feeling in regard to the play.

Miss Shaw has that warm, rich, sympathetic voice, and her acting gives the evidence of much feeling in her portrayal of the old Egyptian nurse, Amrah, which is to be expected, as she is a good artist; but in this play she puts more real feeling than she likes, and in that last act there are real tears, which, from an art standpoint, she does not like to confess.

"Usually," she said, "after the first week you find just about how much real strength and nervous energy you have to put in a play. You could not feel a play night after night and live at all; it would kill you. So at the end of about a week I pull myself up and say, 'Now there is no need of all this work; you are putting too much of yourself into this,' and then I stop. Every gesture, every movement, every intonation of the voice on the stage is given with the idea of producing certain results, and it is not necessary to put so much nervous energy into the work.

"But I have never had a play that seemed to take so much of my force for the amount of work done as this. I look at it all reverently, from an art standpoint, up to the time of the telling of the miracles, and it all has to be done with a delicate and sincere touch. Then I try to feel as one would who had really seen a miracle, and there is a strange personal feeling that I do not have usually. It affects me strangely. It seems to be brought home to me, and I feel as I would if there was some one who was very dear to me who might be saved, and if it would be possible for a miracle to be performed for them.

"I wonder if there would be as much effect in that scene if it did not affect the actors so much if there weren't any real tears in it? I don't believe in tears. It is not art, and I do not cry usually. There is nothing in crying. Any one who has anything to do with a lot of young actors would find that they had tears ready to draw upon at any moment. But this play seems to be different, and there is a reaction after it as there is often after one has been deeply affected, and one seems to feel unusually frivolous coming off the stage.

"No, I have no scruples about the subject of religion on the stage; art embraces everything that life does, everything strong and beautiful and holy if need be. At the rehearsals I felt that the play was going to be very strong. I had never seen one more magnificently set. But there was the question about it and the work had to be delicately done to be acceptable. I felt very nervous the first night. I felt that there would be all classes of people in the audience, Jews, Christians, and infidels—one could not tell who would be in the audience—and for those who were brought in touch with the religious part the play there might be much criticism. Then the play seemed to have a really electric effect, but there is always a feeling of nervous strain in it.

"It seems to me that it ought to have a very strong educational effect, for it teaches the history of those times, both political and religious. I should think it ought to bring people more together—Jews and Christians. It shows plainly that the death of Christ was a political and not a religious act, and that he was born, lived, and died a Jew.

"I should think the feeling of the play might appeal to every one; there is the leading of the afflicted to some great imagined good, you may call it what you like. I say at one time: 'Why should we fear? there is cure for all.' It is these acts of faith in which the Christian Scientists believe.

"The play was not a difficult one for which to prepare. The costumes were all designed for us, and after a little thought for the gestures there was very little difficulty in getting into the atmosphere. I looked up some of the gestures. There is the one of crossing the hands upon the breast as Amrah does. That is the token of self-abnegation, the act of the slave. It is easy to understand we have the feeling that the breast is the dwelling place of the ego, and crossing the hands denotes its suppression. Then the motion of lifting the hand was meant to show originally that the hands were empty, without weapons, as the expression is used now, 'hold up your hands,' when the person is placed in a position of submission. So the slave originally held up the hands, and then they were gradually lowered until they were held out with the palms down.

"The costumes are delightful to wear, demoralizing, though, from the standpoint of the other stage gowns one has to wear in other plays. These are so loose and comfortable—only the tights and the loose robes—that it will seem hard to get into tight, fashionable frocks that are so tiresome and wear you out in different plays. But then they say this is to run two years."

An interesting commentary upon the play came to Miss Shaw in a letter from a woman friend who came to see it, prepared not to like it at all. She was a woman without strong religious tendencies and her words are worth repeating.

"Your work affected me powerfully," she wrote. "Your kneeling with upturned face called a blessing down. I wanted to kneel beside you and cry: 'To me also a blessing.' That is what sincerity has done. Many women around me were weeping."

The scene of the vision of Ben-Hur is one of the most difficult physically in the play—the position of the women with the arm outstretched and that blinding, strong white light beating upon their upturned faces and the heat from it as well.

VARIOUS DRAMATIC TOPICS.

What a queer thing is the theatrical myth! It grows out of nothing and withstands all attempts to suppress it. One familiar with comparatively recent theatrical history would fancy that the story of Joseph Jefferson's relation to Rip Van Winkle as a stage character might be known to everybody. Mr. William Winter lucidly narrated all the facts concerning the growth of Jefferson's portrayal and the development of his play, put into shape for him in 1865 by Dion Boucicault, in his excellent book called "The Jeffersons." Mr. Jefferson tells the same story in his own way in his delightful autobiography. As a very young actor Jefferson played Seth in a crude piece founded on Irving's legend to the Rip of his gifted and short-lived half-brother, Charles Burke. The subject was not new on the stage then. Yates in England, Hackett in America, and other comedians had impersonated Rip Van Winkle. Jefferson had long been desirous of putting Rip in his repertory when, in 1861, he made his first unsuccessful effort with the rôle in a piece put together by himself, which included scenes and bits of dialogue he liked in the Burke play, which, in its turn, was largely taken from older pieces on the same subject. In 1865, after a tour of the world, he put his play in the hands of Boucicault, in London. Yet the yarn is now going the rounds that Jefferson never thought of acting Rip until he saw an allusion to his acting in some "Life of Washington Irving," that he then wrote his play, which was not a play, but a monologue, and that his chief trouble was with his costume, which he pieced together and sewed himself. In London this yarn has been circulated recently as appropriate to discussion of the hardly credible rumor that Beerbohm Tree intends to take up Rip Van Winkle.

Henrietta Crossman, who acted here so well some years ago in various farces, will use Bronson Howard's play called "One of Our Girls" as the medium of her first experiment as a star next Spring. This play was written for Helen Dauvray, who acted its heroine, Kate Shipley, many nights at the Lyceum Theatre in the Winter of 1885-6.

The cast of "The Sunken Bell," in Mr. Sothern's production of the translation of Hauptman's "Die Versunkene Glocke," includes Rowland Buckstone as the Nickelmann, the elemental spirit, originally acted here so well by Mathieu Pfeill, and Norman Parr as the Waldschrat, in which that admirable German comedian, Arthur Eggeling, appeared with fine effect. Old Wittikin, the witch, is impersonated by Mr. Flockton. Mr. Sothern's acting in the rôle of Heinrich was highly praised in Boston, and nothing but the superlative was used in describing Miss Harned's portrayal of Rautendelein.

George Foster Flait's play called "Frederick the Great," in which Lewis Morrison is acting this season, is praised as an interesting and effective piece. La Barbarina, the dancer, Voltaire, and Princess Amelia are among the important personages. The piece scarcely touches history, however, but deals with imaginary incidents in the private life of the Prussian King.

Maude Adams made her first appearance on any stage as a child actress in the company of J. K. Emmet at the historic Bush Street Theatre, in San Francisco, lately destroyed by fire.

"She's shaped like an exclamation point!" So remarked a spectator at a performance of "Three Little Lambs" of Marie Cahill. Miss Cahill is the bright particular star of that new burletta. She is the very embodiment of infectious good humor. She sings very well, in her comic way, she dances with nimble grace, she has good powers of mimicry, but all that she does is as nothing to the mere influence of her jolly personality. She has a very large head, or seems to have, and diminutive ankles and tiny feet. Hence her likeness to an exclamation point in the view of one imaginative spectator.

Theatre managers are the most conservative folk in the world. When they produce plays that are out of the ordinary in manner it is simply because they cannot get promising conventional works. There is more than one sign that in the matter of popular play production the English theatrical market has reached its lowest state. There is nothing new of the ordinarily marketable kind. Jones has not been heard from since the failure of "Carnac Sahib." Pinero is believed to be slowly at work on a play, but nothing is known of its subject; Carton's last work was "Wheels Within Wheels"; Grundy has been doing adaptations, and the latest was a dire failure. Wherefore some of the odd and fanciful efforts of less known playwrights have had a chance. An excess of irony or whimsicality in a play, however, is not a sign of strength, but the contrary. The successful dramatist is the one who sees the most good in his fellow-man, who is honestly interested in noting the influence of human character on human character, and who writes "sympathetically." The ironical, the bitterly or sharply satirical play may live as literature if a Congreve writes it, but it is rarely long successful, no matter how smart it may be as a stage entertainment. The task of the dramatist is the most arduous of all literary pursuits. Dramatic aptitude, the conception of character in action, is as uncommon as subjects for plays are apparently scarce. As long ago as 1728 George Lillo in his preface to "Marina," his adaptation of "Pericles," lamented that all the materials for plays had been used again and again, and that it seemed impossible to find a new subject. Yet the right man finds subjects and knows how to treat them, and good plays will always be forthcoming from time to time, though never, it is to be feared, in sufficient numbers to satisfy the growing clamor for theatrical entertainment.

In spite of Anglo-Saxon alliance and entente cordiale the idea still prevails in England that only one standard of taste obtains in this broad, cosmopolitan land, and that a bad one. Quoted expressions of opinion of English plays and actors in America which appear in the London newspapers, unless they are the fulsome gush provided by the press agents, are generally from the least reputable sources. It seems that the common English mind still refuses to accept sane expressions of sensible opinion as American.

The murder of the villain by a half-breed and the accusation of the hero are incidents in Augustus Thomas's "Arizona," and also in "The Cowboy and the Lady." The half-breed, a Mexican vaquero in Thomas's play, is impelled to the crime for precisely the same motive in both plays. The reason for the hero's silence is more sensible in "Arizona" than in Mr. Fitch's piece. But incidents of this sort belong to the common stock of the romantic dramatist. Nobody will ever infer that Fitch got his idea from Thomas or that Thomas is indebted to Fitch.

The jury of "plain" men in "The Cowboy and the Lady" at the Knickerbocker Theatre is the most lifelike assemblage of good men and true the old stager ever saw in a theatrical representation of a trial. There is not a hint of the irresponsible "supe" about one of the twelve. Nor is there a suspicion of theatricalism in their appearance or their bearing. They seem to listen intently to the evidence and to be deeply impressed by the most significant testimony, such as Mrs. Weston's. The elderly man who sits on the extreme right of the front row is a study for an artist.

Whenever a "minstrel show" gets temporary possession of one of the centrally situated theatres the reminiscent folks begin to talk of the palmy days of Dan Bryant and Eph Horn. But is it possible that any one who remembers, say, the cheap show given by George Christy and his few associates, including Budworth and Griffen, in the little hall on West Twenty-fourth Street in 1865 or thereabout, cannot appreciate the great superiority of the exhibition given by Dockstader and his companions? Christy was a very funny fellow, but Dockstader has quite as large a fund of natural humor and works much harder to make it tell. For two competent ballad singers in the Christy show there are half a dozen quite as competent in Primrose and Dockstader's. The band of instrumentalists is more than twice as large, the scenery is better, while in the matter of costumes and light effects the new shows are abreast of the times.

The first night of "The Three Little Lambs," at the Fifth Avenue Theatre Adele Ritchie was all but smothered in "floral offerings" at the end of Act. I. Mr. Philp, Mr. Carleton, and the leader of the orchestra were at their wits' end to know what to do with the tributes of regard passed over the footlights for the prima donna of Mr. Knowles's newly organized troupe. The gifts were out of all proportion to the merit of Miss Ritchie's performance. Marie Cahill, who made the hit of the night, got no tributes of flowers. But Raymond Hitchcock, the comedian, found a stray bud on the stage and presented it to his partner in drollery with so much ceremony as to set the spectators roaring with laughter.

Women Here and There—Their Frills and Fancies

There was an Italian bridal party on a Third Avenue elevated train the other day. The party got on at the City Hall, and there was no mistaking it. It was not the costumes, for a good many people of that nationality wear more brilliant and attractive clothes when engaged in their ordinary occupations. This party consisted of the bride and groom and an older man and woman and a small boy, who was probably brought along because he could not be left alone at home. The five seated themselves in the car, the bride and groom in the centre, the other man beside the man, and the older woman beside the younger woman. These older attendants were evidently making facetious remarks, and it was these with their glances at the young people and the sheepish expressions of the latter that proclaimed the nature of the errand down town. As if that were not enough the older man took the marriage certificate from his pocket and examined it carefully, the groom perusing it with him, but with the air of one to whom it was Greek. As far as personal attentions from the bride to the groom were concerned no would have imagined their relations. He gave his entire attention to the older man, who did all the talking, without one look at his bride, who watched him half jealously. She had evidently done something to prepare for this important event in her life. She wore quite a smart new dark blue and white striped waist, with a new black skirt. She had a little black velvet bow on her uncovered head, and nice new boots with shiny pointed toes, on her feet. The bridegroom looked shabby. His white shirt had been worn before, and he had no collar with it, though there was an old celluloid stud in the collar band. None of his clothes was new, and his boots sadly needed blacking, but even he had made one concession to the occasion: He had two brand new creases down the front of his trouser legs.

Signs of the new year are already to be seen. Magazines which put on their covers the date of the expiration of the subscription have for those to expire in the coming year the abbreviation of '00 where the date for the past year was '99. Some of the scientists who see signs and wonders in everything ought to make something mysterious out of those two ciphers The woman who saw the evolution of the world in the big sleeves certainly could.

The real live Santa Claus who was in one of the stores this Christmas was a comfort to the children. It is all right to write Santa Claus letters, but that is nothing to telling him in person and receiving an assurance that requests will be granted.

One little girl decided this Christmas that she would like above all things a doll dressed in blue, and she consequently wrote to Santa Claus to notify him of her decision. That would have been all right, but it was only a short time before Christmas that she was taken down town to see all the pretty things in the shops, and there she saw so many charming dolls and of them all there was none so pretty as those dressed in pink, and she had asked for one dressed in blue. That would have been discomforting if Santa Claus had not been right at hand. She went up and explained.

"What is your name, little girl?" asked Santa Claus.

"Dolly Brown," said the little girl.

"Oh, yes," said Santa, "here I have it. Dolly Brown has written to ask for a doll dressed in blue." He had been turning the leaves of a big book gravely, and when he came to the place where he read that Dolly Brown's name was written, he carefully wrote pink across the page to show that he would be sure to make the change.

"I want a pair of gloves," said Dolly Brown's small sister, encouraged by this.

"What kind?" asked Santa Claus. "Do you want gloves or mittens, and woolen ones, or what?"

"I want tid ones, like Auntie Jane's," said the little girl, taking hold of Aunt Jane's hand.

"Very well," said Santa Claus, writing again, "you tell Aunt Jane to take you to the glove counter and have you fitted, and we will see that you have them." And there were no happier little girls in town that night than those, who had had a personal conversation with Santa Claus.

There were a good many small girls who were delighted with very large home-made dolls this year. The cloth for them was sold in the shops, the figure of the doll stamped upon two pieces and then these were stitched together by the mammas and stuffed and dressed. The beauty of these dolls was that they were so big that each little girl who had one felt that it was almost as good as a live baby. The clothes of a one-year-old baby fitted the dolls exactly. Two little girls had two of them dressed exactly alike with clothes, every one of which could be put on and off. The dolls seemed to be universally popular this year. On Christmas morning people living in a certain up-town city block saw two papas taking their two little girls and their respective charges out for a constitutional. Each papa was leading his little girl with his left hand, while with his right he wheeled a doll carriage in which was one of these mammoth home-made dolls.

Perhaps every one does not know it, but Santa Claus is a most accommodating old gentleman. One small boy had asked this year for a stocking cap, one of those nice warm ones that pull down over the ears. Then, just before Christmas, he needed that cap so much to go out one day that it did seem too bad that Christmas had not come a little sooner.

"I will tell you what I will do," said mamma, "I will go up stairs and call up to Santa Claus and see if he could not let us have that cap a little before Christmas if he is going to send one, just as a convenience. If he is willing, then you can go up and get it."

So mamma went up stairs, and in a moment she came down again with the joyful news that Santa Claus was perfectly willing on this occasion, as there seemed to be a good reason for having the cap. So the small boy trotted up stairs, and there, sure enough, on the floor in front of the heater lay just the kind of a cap the small boy wanted, and it was so very nice to receive this special favor from Santa Claus that the small boy and his brothers and sisters thought almost more of the cap than of the things Santa Claus came himself to bring on Christmas Eve.

"My children have always known who the real Santa Claus was," says a careful mother. "I remember when I learned that there was no Santa Claus and how unhappy and cheated and miserable and humiliated I felt, and they never have had a chance to be made as uncomfortable. Then I think it is just as well for them to know, from a practical standpoint. From this wonderful Santa Claus, who has untold treasures from which to draw, they may expect anything, but they know that there is a limit to the capabilities of their parents and they do not expect as much."

It is the last place in the world any one would expect to see a woman unless she had some particular court business there, and of all things the last it would be expected to find her doing would be making fancy little silk and filigree ornaments for women to wear in their hair. But she certainly is there in the big rotunda of the Court House, on the second floor, where all around are the court rooms, where more or less serious cases are being tried, and there she has been ever since a week or so before Christmas, making these frivolous butterflies and doing a good business selling them.

The woman is of French and German descent. She learned this work in France, and she came on, as so many people from different countries did, to the World's Fair, and then, finding this a land of promise, remained. The work she does is called French filigree work. With silver and gold wires and bits of silk she makes these pretty things. The silk forms the foundation of the wings, and gives the dominating color, violet, pale green, pale blue, or some brown with gold. The small ones are intended simply for ornaments, and the larger ones, the size of a mammoth butterfly, for theatre bonnets. They are all fastened to long, strong pins. Why any one should have thought of selecting the Court House as a likely place to dispose of these wares it is difficult to tell, but it is a very good place, unlikely as it may seem; for all classes and conditions of man, and many of them find their way there during the day, and there are not many who have not a sister or wife or sweetheart who might like a butterfly, and the apparent incongruity of finding butterflies in such a place calls attention to them. The young woman has a small glass case in which she displays her wares and a little table behind which she sits working in a quiet, unostentatious way. She sometimes goes to the lobbies of hotels, she says, and this position she chose this year because the hotels did not seem available. The incongruity of it all seems to be in the pretty frivolousness of the things she sells against the austere background of the building, with serious legal squabbles all around.

The Chinese women have recently taken to sewing machines, and it is a shame. Pretty soon there will be no national characteristics or illusions in the world. The Manila woman uses a hand sewing machine and makes pretty little gowns, if she has a pattern, or another gown to work by, and is thereby a great comfort to our countrywomen whose lot has thrown them into that land. The Manila woman doesn't count so much, any way. We have never known so much about her, but when it comes to Oriental garments from China or Japan with closely stitched seams instead of the big stitches an inch or more in length, to which we are accustomed in their work, it will seem that the world has some way gone wrong. It was bad enough to have monogram fans made in Japan after Occidental designs, but when Occidentalism gets into the sewing, there is not much to be hoped for.

A Brooklyn woman had an experience not long ago. She thinks as she tells about it that it was a very amusing experience; so perhaps it was, but not every one would have looked at it in that light. There was a young woman staying in the house who was greatly in need of a skein of embroidery silk. She did not feel that she had time to go for it, or she did not wish to, which is much the same thing; so, knowing just which one of the New York stores would have it, she sent for it. The silk would cost 11 cents, and she could not send that amount very conveniently, so she wrote to have her goods delivered C. O. D. They were, but for some reason, whether because they came from New York, no one knew, but they arrived very late at night, and every one in the house had retired. It was the woman of the house who heard the bell, of course; she is always the one who sleeps with one ear open, and it was she who got up, partially dressed, and went to the door. Then there was the package to pay for, and she hurried back, found her purse, and paid the bill. The chief feature of the story is that she never said a word to show that she did not think it one of the amusing small accidents of life. There are people who would have expressed their views upon C. O. D. packages plainly upon such an occasion.

A Denver dog has been honored with one of the most elaborate coffins ever given to one of his kind, and there are not many more elaborate made. This dog had been a beloved pet in the family for many years. He was said to know as much as a child, and he got a coffin of mahogany with silver trimmings, which cost nearly $200. All much-loved dogs are not equally well treated. This was a pug, and another pug, who was the much-loved pet of another woman, was not so well honored. He was a most intelligent animal, who bore serenely the name Confucius. Confucius's mistress, during his lifetime, in passing the undertakers' shops, where there is usually on exhibition a little white coffin, would always exclaim, "Ah, that is the kind of coffin in which I shall bury my Confucius." But when at last Confucius's end came, he was buried like any other dog, although he was deeply mourned. But his mistress was a New England woman, and there may be a difference between New England and Western standards.

Another woman plainly wanted money, and said so. She wanted to get to Washington, and it seemed to her very hard that in a great city like New York, where there was such an abundance of money, and so much of it spent for comparatively useless things, that she could not have a hundred dollars. She didn't want to go to work in New York; if she could only get to Washington she would be able to find all she wanted to do, and she wanted a hundred dollars. But even with all the money in New York it is sometimes difficult to raise as large a sum as that, and she, too, was dismissed.

FEMININE FRILLS.

"Nothing suits me better in stationery," says the young woman artist, "than a plain white with a block letter raised. No color, nothing but this simple letter, and it is quiet, refined, and yet your stationery is not quite the same as your neighbor's."

"Yes," said the cook, "that pastry was tough, and it was a mistake I made that will always bring about the same results. I put too much water in in mixing it. The very least water that can be used in making pie crust the better, and it is possible to use very little."

The prettiest things for flowers that have been introduced during the holidays are the big vases of cocoanut fibre. They are large, most of them in some classic shape, with graceful curves and handles. They are filled with growing plants or cut flowers. Pots or tall dishes for the cut flowers have to be set inside. The effects of bright flowers or green foliage in contrast with the rough brown cocoanut fibre is charming. A hanging ball of the fibre with growing plants inside is extremely pretty.

There never was a time when women wore more jewelry out of sight of their own eyes, even in the mirror, than now. There are so many little jeweled pins worn in the back of the hair and others in the back of the collar, that there is a brilliant effect in looking down upon an audience of women in the theatre from the rear. Of two or three women sitting near each other one evening, one had a sunburst of diamonds at the back of her collar, another had inside a black gown a bit of white tulle tied in the back in a fluffy little bow and fastened with a beautiful diamond ornament; an older woman next her had a diamond pin in her dark hair, holding up the short locks, which are so untidy when they fall; a charming pin of rather odd shape, with four large stones in it; and still another woman wore in her hair one of the rather familiar little circlets in the form of a wreath set with pearls and emeralds. These four women were sitting almost side by side.

One pretty blonde woman, dressed in black, wore jet in a rather interesting way. She had a collar of it, a belt of heavy jet, and one made for her, not bought ready-made in the shops, and in her hair she wore a comb with a heavy jet top. To relieve the effect of the jet, which is somewhat unbecoming to a woman with a delicate color, she wore a string of pearls close around her throat over a little tie of white tulle worn above the collar.

The collars to many of the handsome cloaks that are now worn to the theatres are some cause of anxiety to their wearers. They are stiffened to give the proper effect, and being high, they have to be adjusted carefully when the wearer slips the cloak down from her shoulders as she takes her seat. A crushed collar is ruined.

Among the pretty pieces of lace in the possession of Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, the Lady Bapchild of the "Manoeuvres of Jane," is a charming old shawl, that beautiful run lace which is now fashionable, and poor examples of which are to be seen in the shops. This shawl of Mrs. Whiffen's is charming. It is run on the finest of net and was made by some aunts of hers, one of whom is now over seventy, when they were young girls.

"Oh, dear," says Miss Grace Elliston, the Lady Curtoys in "Wheels Within Wheels," "the patent-leather shoes I wear with my tailor suit in the play are lovely. They cost $12, and I don't suppose a soul in the audience knows that I so much as wear shoes, to say nothing of such pretty ones."

***

The white gown Miss Elliston wears in that play is cut round and low at the throat, a difficult style for most people to wear, though very becoming to her. With it she wears a single string of pearls. She planned at first to wear something broad clasping around the throat and covering it. Then she decided not to, because, as she said, when a woman grows older she loses the beauty of her throat and has to cover it, and while one is young and can, it is better to dress the neck simply. It is quite true that the throat loses its beauty all too soon, but the back of the neck retains its youthfulness much longer. A woman with a neck that has any pretensions to beauty can wear her gowns cut a little low at the back when she finds it advisable to wear wrinkle-concealing ornaments in front.

***

A good many pretty gowns are finished around the lower edge of the skirt with fur. They are charming in effect, but with the long skirts they have so much of an additional body to catch dust and germs that to the practical mind their beauty is somewhat diminished. On skating costumes with a short skirt the fur is altogether attractive and has a suggestion of warmth about it that is delightful in a gown for out-door Winter sports. A gracefully shaped fur yoke and high collar are also charming in the skating gowns.

***

It is very good fun now to run across a fashion plate of some thirty years ago and compare it with an illustrated fashion magazine of to-day. It is better to have a number of the old plates of different periods from thirty or forty years ago, and then the combinations of styles can be seen. There is one modern fashion plate that has a very old-fashioned appearance, though it is handsome. The skirt is long and kilt plaited. That is rather more recent, but the overdress is distinctly old. It comes well down to the bottom of the skirt and is cut in deep scallops edged with fringe, and inside the edge a band of velvet ribbon. With this gown is worn a velvet coat with elaborate jet trimming, a broad band of ornamental work around the lower edge, growing narrower from the back, where the coat is longest, until it runs up on either side of the front in narrow bands. There is more elaborate ornamentation just below the neck, and a big ornamental pattern is in the back, running from the neck down to the waist line, in a narrow point. There is a large pattern of the jet at the top and on the lower edge of the sleeves. From the throat down it is all that funny reminiscent old fashion, but above there is a high flaring collar with a fur and velvet toque that looks modern. The woman of thirty or more years ago who was old enough to wear an elaborately trimmed velvet coat would probably have worn a bonnet with strings, and she would have considered herself, and most people would have considered her, very frivolous if she had worn anything in the nature of a hat.

***

Pretty little bodice effects are seen in a good many gowns, soft broad bands of silk drawn tightly around the waist, with two points in front, and they are very pretty and a pleasant change from the narrow line of stitched silk and velvet that has been worn so much.

***

A charming little English velvet coat is of brown velvet stitched with cream-white silk and with a grebe collar, the grebe showing at the top the little brown edge that is so pretty, some people think, on the grebe, and which others do not like, but which with the brown velvet is charming.

***

The fichu effect is to be seen in many pretty dinner and evening gowns. One of pale crêpe de chine has a vest and high collar of lace, and around the vest, which ends at the bust and may almost be called a deep pointed yoke, is draped loosely the fichu, also of the lace, and finished with a chou of the crêpe de chine. The sleeves are of the lace, with a loose band of the crêpe de chine over the elbow. Another pretty gown has a fichu of some pretty, thin white material edged with lace. The gown is cut low at the neck, the fichu is worn over the shoulders and secured on the bust with flowers, the ends showing below. The lace to this fichu is deeper at the shoulders and falls over the arms, forming a little cap to the sleeves. The sleeves are shirred and finished at the elbow with a bow and fall of lace.

***

A pretty evening gown of thin material with bead trimmings has straps over the shoulders formed of strands of beads held together on top of the shoulders with a clasp. The upper part of the arm is exposed below this upper band, and below to the wrist is a transparent sleeve of the material of the gown, shirred.

One of the most attractive little garments that the baby wears is the sweater. They come in very small sizes for a baby of six months, and they have such a grown-up appearance that the baby looks like a little sportsman in them.

An out-of-town paper tells of a fad for collecting valuable stones of different kinds and having them set in chains. It is a paragraph that has probably been making the rounds of out-of-town papers, as such paragraphs do, and appended to it is the statement: "Frequently these can be picked up very cheaply at old curio shops." That may be so, possibly, out of New York, but it is a rare thing to find an old curio shop here where anything can be bought very cheaply. The old curio shop is apt to charge the prices of the first-class jewelry shops, with the goods a little defaced and damaged, and a little higher price added on that account, because the things are "old." There are stories of bargains told occasionally, but they are difficult to prove. A woman, passing through a quiet, out-of-the-way street, one day, saw a little, shabby old shop, with a spinning wheel exhibited in the window. The shop was in a dwelling house. Ringing the bell, she could get no answer for a time, but finally a man appeared from the basement.

"How much do you ask for that spinning wheel?" she inquired.

"Twenty-six dollars!" snapped the man, and disappeared.

A WEEK'S NEWS OF HAVANA

Americans Provide Trees for Cuban Children—Ball Postponed Because of Gen. Lawton's Death.

Foreign Correspondence New York Times.

HAVANA, Dec. 25.—Shortly after noon on Dec. 23 the cannon of Cabanas fired a parting salute to Gen. Brooke, ex-Military Governor of Cuba, as figuratively speaking he shook the dust of the island from his boots as he sailed for the United States. Within two hours the same guns were firing the welcome to the new chief dignitary, Gen. Wood, as he stood in the palace of Gen. Ludlow, and with that General and his wife received the officers of the army and navy, their families, and the citizens of Havana. It was a brilliant scene, with plenty of color supplied by the uniforms of our officers and of the German officers from the man-of-war now in port and the bright gowns of the women.

Every one was anxious to see and meet the man who, within the brief space of eighteen months has risen from an army Surgeon with the rank of Captain to be a Major General of the army. Surrounding Gen. Wood were veterans of the civil war, men grown old in hard service both then and later on the frontier, and yet some of them wearing but Captain's shoulder straps still. Besides Gen. and Mrs. Ludlow and Gen. Wood, Gen. Chaffee and Col. Richards, both of the staff, were in the receiving party. Huge baskets of roses were scattered about the rooms. All of the officers in the department were present, with a single exception, the one who remained at Cabanas to superintend the firing of salutes.

Gen. Wood wears his honors easily, yet with a dignity that is impressive. Already at his suggestion most of the troops are being sent home from Santiago Province, and as soon as practicable he hopes to send others. His idea seems to be to give Cuba as much to the Cubans as possible, and as soon as possible. All of the Americans holding Government positions having been appointed thereto by Gen. Brooke are trembling lest their official heads may fall in the near future. Every one looks forward to seeing many changes in January.

In the morning the farewell reception to Gen. Brooke was at the Palace. Arrangements had been made to have a military parade on a small scale in his honor, but the idea was abandoned at his request. The officers simply went to bid him good-bye, and many women were present also. A great many officers accompanied the General to the wharf.

The weekly receptions at the palace under Gen. Brooke's régime were much looked forward to and largely attended. The last social affair given there was a german. All present were Americans, excepting one Cuban girl. It was a beautiful sight, and the grand reception rooms, which have witnessed affairs of State for generations, perhaps never looked more gorgeous. The favors were very pretty. The german was led by Capt. Butler of the Seventh Cavalry and Miss Ingalls, a niece of the General in whose honor the affair was given. Had the Brookes remained, there would doubtless have been an abundance of gayety for the younger people, as well as for the older, in the palace where Weyler and Blanco lived, and whence they issued the edicts that caused the natives such trouble.

During the past week we have grown quite accustomed to the booming of guns in salute. The Texas came in on her sad mission—to carry the bodies of the Maine victims from their resting place in Colon Cemetery to the North—and her guns rang out in salute, which was returned by the cannon at Cabanas, formerly the chief military prison of the Spaniards, and which has now been designated as the place from which salutes shall be fired. A German man-of-war came in, and the international salute was fired and responded to.

We can scarcely realize that Christmas is at hand—the time which at home sees wreaths of holly and bunches of mistletoe, Christmas packages, the Christmas tree, with its candles and tinsel; the Christmas dinner, with its turkey and plum pudding; the shops, with their windows gayly decorated, and crowds of shoppers. Havana knows none of these things, with the exception of the dinner. The little children do not hang up their stockings, and most of them have never even heard of a Christmas tree, while Santa Claus, with his sleigh and reindeers, is another tale utterly strange to them. Last year some Americans who had been here only a short time gave presents to some Cuban acquaintances, and found the recipients wondering why the presents were given.

When the Spanish rule came to an end there was not a church of any denomination other than Catholic on the island; that was the only one encouraged and supported by the Government, and none other could exist. Now there are several chapels of other denominations; the Methodists have one; there is a Presbyterian chapel, as well as an Episcopalian. All of these are necessarily struggling for mere existence, and are merely missionary chapels, supported by the few Americans who attend them, and by contributions from the United States. The Episcopal Chapel has been unfortunate of late, in that its pastor has had yellow fever, and as he lives in the same building as that in which services are held, the congregation has had to meet elsewhere, and is without a home.

The women of the Episcopal Church guild have prepared a Christmas tree for the children of the Sunday school. The tree was given by a Washington florist, and the ornaments for it by various people. For each of the little boys—thirty-two of them—there is a toy. The children have a hymn to sing, and there will be an address telling why Christmas is celebrated. Then will follow the distribution of gifts and candy. The tree will be in a room that has been loaned for the occasion.

The English-speaking school is also to have a tree for its pupils, and there is to be an entertainment by the pupils. The children are almost without exception Cubans, but English is the only language spoken in the school.

As if to make this seem more like Christmas the weather has turned so cold that heavy clothing and wraps are in order. The change started with a rain early on Sunday morning, and before night it was so chilly that it seemed almost possible for it to snow.

On account of Gen. Lawton's death a number of affairs have been postponed, including the ball of the Wanderers' Club, which was to have been held on Friday night. The club is composed of Americans principally, though there are some Englishmen in it, and one or two Cubans. The ball is to be in the Maestranza, formerly the Spanish artillery barracks. It is an immense building, and is occupied by a dozen or more families of officers, but still there is much room left.

All society is going to welcome the New Year in at a ball at Gen. Ludlow's.

ADRIAN ISELIN'S PURCHASE.

Completing New Rochelle's Water System—Planning for the Future.

The purchase of thirty-five acres of land in Tuckahoe from the A. T. Stewart estate by Adrian Iselin is said to complete the watershed from which Mr. Iselin's New Rochelle water supply system is provided. The purchase was effected through William A. White & Sons, the agents for the Stewart estate.

Mr. Iselin recently acquired a similar strip at a large figure. The price paid for the present acquisition was $26,250, or $750 an acre. The works in which Mr. Iselin is interested now supply New Rochelle, Pelham, and part of East Chester. There has been talk of a combination of interests between his company and the New York and Westchester Water Company with a view to making a bid for selling water to this city, but it has also been said that Mr. Iselin goes further than this, and in the belief that New Rochelle will eventually come into the City of New York, looks to a profitable disposal of the whole system to the city.

IN FOREIGN LANDS.

THE APPEAL OF EX-CAPT. DREYFUS AGAINST AMNESTY.—The Amnesty Committee of the French Senate is now drawing up the scheme of a general amnesty bill which, if it becomes a law, will wipe out the effect of all judgments that have been given in the Dreyfus case, and in cases growing out of this cause célèbre, and will also prohibit all further prosecution of any person involved on either side. The objections to a general amnesty act, which have been made by M. Zola and Lieut. Col. Picquart and others, have already been presented in this column. And now Alfred Dreyfus writes to the President of the Senatorial Amnesty Committee, M. Clamageran, showing his reasons why he personally objects to amnesty. The letter, which is dated at Carpentras, in the South of France, where M. Dreyfus is now staying, reads as follows:

"On the very day that liberty was given me through an act of the administration which I had not solicited, I wrote the following declaration: 'The Government of the republic restores to me my liberty. It is nothing to me without honor. From to-day and henceforth I intend to follow up the reparation of the terrible judicial error of which I am still the victim. I want the whole of France to know by a definite judgment that I am innocent. My heart will never be at rest until there is no longer a Frenchman who imputes to me the crime that another has committed.'

"It is not for me to intervene in the political discussions aroused by the amnesty question, but, if the judgment which has been unjustly passed upon me has deprived me of my rights as a citizen, I still keep my full rights as a man. I only ask one thing from the authorities—that they will not take away any of the means which are conferred upon me by the law of following up the revision of my case. I have neither hatred nor rancor in my heart, but for my children as for myself I desire the proclamation of my innocence in the name of the republic, in the name of France. I have a right to truth, to justice. I ask, then, that I be left every means of legally establishing that I am innocent of the crime committeed by another, for which I have been twice unjustly condemned."

THE LATEST ASPECT OF ANGLOPHOBIA IN FRANCE.—Le Journal des Débats is about the only paper in Paris which contains what Englishmen consider to be a fair account of the war in South Africa. The Débats does not, however, approve of the war, but having once presented its reasons, it has refrained from vulgar exultation over the British reverses. Most of the papers of Paris receive their news from the Boer news agency that has been established in Brussels, while the war dispatches in the London papers are only drawn upon as they tend to be discouraging to the British cause. In the meantime literary strategists are discussing through the press the best way of humbling the pride of Great Britain as though a war with the empire were inevitable.

M. Henry Fouquier, a candidate for the Academy, has appealed to the people of France in a long communication to the journals, in which he states that the supposed invincible British fleet could be destroyed by "bold torpedo tactics, aided by the hazard of storms." "And it is high time for the powers to strike," he concludes. The business could be easily performed by a march of 100,000 Russians on India, "by expeditions into China, Egypt, and Ireland, and by a movement like that of the Africanders in the Dominion of Canada."

Another article which is seriously commented on by the Anglophobic press appeared recently from the pen of the notorious Jew-baiter, M. Drumont, in his paper, La Libre Parole. He maintains that it is not France that desires to go to war with Great Britain, but Englishmen, who want to destroy the French navy before it could combine with the navies of Russia and Germany. He then upbraids M. Delcassé, or those who forced the French Minister to cause Marchand to abandon Fashoda, when if a blow had been boldly dealt at Great Britain Russia would have invaded India, and Menelek would have entered the Soudan, while Germany would have offered secret assistance against the common rival and enemy.

The effusions by MM. Fouquier and Drumont are representative of hundreds of articles that are daily appearing in the French press, many of them by men of international reputation, and all suggesting various methods of armed attack upon Great Britain.

ENCOURAGING OUTLOOK FOR ITALY'S EAST AFRICAN COLONY.—A committee recently appointed by the Italian Government for the purpose of investigating the financial and industrial state of the colony of Erythrea is about to make its report, with suggestions for the future development of the East African territory. The report, it is said, will confirm the rumors of the existence of gold in large quantities in Erythrea, and will be made to show that the colony will eventually prove less burdensome to the Italian exchequer than hitherto. Aside from the investigations conducted by the committee, the rumors about gold discoveries acquired such consistency a few months ago as to warrant the employment of two mining experts, one from New Zealand and the other from Alaska, in order to examine the nature and extent of the gold-bearing reefs.

Replying to questions on the subject in the Chamber the other day, Signor Fusinato, Under Minister of Foreign Affairs, confirmed the existence of the deposits, and added that the results of expert investigation were of a nature to justify hopes, though further investigation would be necessary to ascertain the possibility of working the deposits remuneratively. Meanwhile the Italian Government would examine the demands for concessions with the utmost favor, and do everything possible to encourage enterprise.

THE DESTRUCTION OF WOLVES IN FRANCE.—M. Jean Dupuy, the French Minister of Agriculture, has just furnished an interesting report concerning the destruction of wolves in France. The total number of the animals killed last year was 197, of which two were she wolves with young, 83 wolves not with young, and 112 cubs. The amount paid in bounties equaled 13,075 francs, or $2,615. They were killed in different departments, but while none were killed in the Pyrennes and only one in the Alps, nearly all the rest were in the four central departments of the Charente, the Vienne, the Dordogne, and the Haute-Vienne.

In the sixteen years between 1883 and 1898 inclusive 8,236 wolves have been destroyed and bounties paid equaling 594,075 francs, or $118,815. In 1883 and 1884 the number of wolves killed was 1,316 and 1,055, but under the influence of the new law, raising the bounty per head to $30 for a wolf with young, $20 for an ordinary wolf, and 40 francs, or $8 for a cub, there has been a rapid reduction in their numbers, and it is believed that in a very few years they will become extinct.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT TO PURCHASE FOUR IMPORTANT RAILWAYS.—The French Budget Committee has reported in favor of the purchase by the State of the Eastern, Western, Orleans, and Southern Railways. Although the concessions of these companies do not expire until the middle of the next century, the State has the right to buy them at any time under certain conditions. It is calculated by the committee that no outlay of capital will be required on the part of the State to effect the operation, as two out of the four companies are already indebted to the State, and the State by taking over the four companies would realize an immediate profit of over 37,500,000 francs. On the other hand, it was pointed out that if the State does not take over the companies it would have to pay them, until the legal expiration of their existence half a century hence, an annuity which would amount to 312,500,000 francs.

The report of the committee also maintains that under State control the profits of the four railways would be larger than at present, and affirms that unless the State purchases the railways before the close of the present year the annuity it will have to pay is likely to be increased by over 6,000,000 francs a year owing to the augmentation in traffic that is expected to result from the exposition.

An attempt was recently made to rush the matter through the Chamber, but as more information was demanded on the subject, the report of the Budget Committee was laid on the table until after the holidays, when it is expected that an act authorizing the purchase will be passed.

THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

Notes and Items of Interest About the Great Fair of 1900.

Commissioner General Peck has decided to set aside a fund of $10,000 for a corn kitchen at the Paris Exposition. Visitors to the French show will get sweet corn from the American fields. It will be taken to Paris in refrigerators and served temptingly with pure butter, hot and appetizing. Corn cakes made of the best grade of meal will be parcelled out by a typical "mamm" from the South, and corn fritters which will satisfy the palates of the most fastidious will be fried.

Secretary Root has issued an order appropriating $25,000 from the revenues of Cuba to defray the expense of an exhibit of the products, manufactures, and industries of that island in the Paris Exposition next year. The order places the exhibit under the direction of Señor Quesada, the Special Commissioner of Cuba at Washington, who will report to United States Commissioner General Ferdinand W. Peck.

President McKinley has appointed Mr. Robert J. Thompson of Chicago a special Honorary Commissioner to present for President McKinley to President Loubet of France the first Lafayette souvenir dollar struck at the United States Mint in Philadelphia.

Mr. Thompson is the author of the Lafayette Monument project, and secretary of the Lafayette Memorial Commission. Fifty thousand souvenir dollars have been issued from the Philadelphia Mint and shipped to the Lafayette Commission in Chicago, where they are deposited with the American Trust and Savings Bank.

The Lafayette dollars are now offered to the public at $2 each, and they can be subscribed for by writing to Secretary Robert J. Thompson, Chicago, or to the American Trust and Savings Bank in that city; 15,000 of the coins have already been subscribed and paid for, and will be delivered immediately. Ten thousand coins are to be reserved for distribution in France next year during the exposition, which leaves 20,000 for sale in America. Orders for the coins have been received from ex-President Cleveland, the Hon. William J. Bryan, and other distinguished Americans.

The labor of the National Jury for the selection of the works destined for the United States display in the Fine Arts section of the exposition has been completed by the acceptance of 150 paintings culled from galleries on this side, which will leave 100 to be chosen from among the American artists abroad.

A model American lumber yard, with complete accessories, is to be exhibited at the World's Fair by the Lumbermen's Exchange of Philadelphia. The exhibit will cost several thousands of dollars and will be in charge of a committee of five members.

Gov. Mount of Indiana has appointed Miss Rebecca A. Insley of Indianapolis as one of the State Commissioners to the exposition. Miss Insley is a woman of literary ability and is on the editorial staff of The Indianapolis News. Gov. Mount has appointed five women as State Commissioners from Indiana. They are Miss Tarquin L. Voss, Mrs. Culop, Miss Alice Woods, Mrs. John O. Perrin, and Miss Insley.

Dr. Selim H. Peabody, formerly Regent of the University of Illinois, has received the appointment of editor and statistician for the American Commission to the exposition. Dr. Peabody has entered upon his duties. He will sail for Paris with the commission in February.

In a recent address made at the National Export Exposition in Philadelphia, Commissioner General Peck detailed some of the work which had been done by the United States Commission for the exhibits of the United States at the Paris Exposition. Commissioner Peck said that exhibits had been selected from every one of the forty-five States of this Nation; that America would have 7,000 exhibitors, and that these exhibits must now be concentrated and the herculean work undertaken of getting them across the ocean and installed in the Paris Exposition. At Paris the capstone would be placed upon the monument of a century of American progress. The American exhibits would be ten times as many as at Vienna, six times as many as in Paris in 1878, four times as many as in Paris in 1889, and two and one-half times more than France had at Chicago in 1893.

Commissioner General Peck expects to go to Paris in February, and will probably remain there until the close of the exposition.

A well-known American manufacturing concern has received a contract from Paris for 100 trolley cars, which will be run on the new electric street railroads now being constructed by the City of Paris to accommodate the crowds that will attend the Paris Exposition.

California will exhibit at the Paris Exposition an immense piece of timber, which will give the rest of the world some idea of the kind of trees that State can grow. The timber was cut from a giant sugar pine tree, and is 29 feet long and 4 feet thick. The tree, when standing in the forest, measured 27 feet 4 inches in circumference 6 feet above the ground. The timber is a magnificent specimen of the sugar pine, being perfectly sound.

The Normal High School for Girls in Philadelphia will make an exhibit in the American Educational Department at the exposition. It will be a practical illustration of the work of the laboratories, equipment methods, and results obtained by nature study in the Normal School and School of Observation. A number of magnificent photographs, 8 by 10 inches, represent students at work.

Dr. Tarleton H. Bean, Director of Forestry and Fisheries to the exposition, says that a part of the United States forestry display at the Paris Exposition, made by American lumbermen, will be a typical American mill, and have in it every variety of wood dealt in or exported. Even the shingles will be American made and come from different sections, from Maine to

HONORED BY KING HUMBERT.

John Cavagnaro of the firm of J. & F. Cavagnaro, general machinists, of 215 Centre street, has been honored by King Humbert of Italy with the insignia of Cavaliere della Corona d'Italia. This decoration is a mark of the royal appreciation of the interest taken by Mr. Cavagnaro in the affairs of the Italian colony in New York.

Mr. Cavagnaro came to this country in 1853 with his parents, being at the time eleven years old. From childhood he underwent the struggles that most immigrants do. He was among the first pupils of the Five Points House of Industry in 1856. He finally underwent an apprenticeship with a machinist, with whom he remained for twenty-two years. He then went into partnership with his brother Francis, and his business has since thrived, until it has reached large proportions. Mr. Cavagnaro has been an organizer among his fellow-countrymen, being one of the founders of several organizations for improving their social and political conditions, and for benevolent purposes.

Among these are the Colombo Guard, which for many years celebrated the anniversaries of the landing of Columbus; the Italian Statuto, of which he was commander for fourteen years; the Italian Benevolent Society, of which he was President; the United Society of New York, Brooklyn, and adjacent cities, of which he has also been President, and the Italian Mutual Benefit Society in New York, of which he was President. He is also a member of the American Museum of Natural History.

For many years he has been a member of the Tammany Hall General Committee of the Third Assembly District, and has represented the organization at different times as a delegate and alternate

Themes and Topics

In the Musical World

Let us dispense with high art for a few moments and discuss a plain question of operatic politics, one that is of vast importance to the public. When the people who went to the Metropolitan Opera House a few evenings ago to hear Mme. Calvé sing Marguerite in Gounod's opera "Faust" they beheld at the outer doors signs telling them that the eminent dispenser of dramatic action was indisposed and that her place would be taken by Miss Suzanne Adams. That there was much ado is now an old story. Those who had bought their seats in advance had to accept Miss Adams, and that many of them found something to applaud heartily in her performance is to her credit.

Mr. Grau has since receded from the ground so long held by him, and has announced that money will be refunded when there is a change of the advertised cast affecting any of the principal singers. Mr. Grau thus comes at last to the position long held by THE NEW YORK TIMES, that the public goes to the Metropolitan Opera House chiefly to hear the singers, not the operas. Of course the public wishes to hear the singers in the operas which it likes, and in so far as this is true there is room for complaint also when the opera is changed. But the singer is the ruling attraction at the Opera House. So long as that is the case, the claim of the public that money should be returned when a principal, who has been announced, does not appear is a just one.

Nevertheless, the new order of things will work hardship to the manager. Whenever a principal of large popularity is indisposed and cannot sing, he will have to lose many dollars. There will very rarely be an occasion when he will be able to substitute another of equal importance. The reason of this is that the chief singers of the Metropolitan company regard it as beneath their artistic dignity to act as substitutes. It is quite safe to say that Mme. Eames, for example, would refuse to sing Marguerite in the place of Mme. Calvé, indisposed. In the end Mr. Grau would have to offer Miss Adams or Miss Strong, and the public would demand its money back. Frequent changes of this kind would cause such general dissatisfaction that serious injury would be worked to the season.

That such a condition of affairs ought not to exist is plain. In the first place, it is all nonsense to suppose that any harm can come to one of the famous singers of the company by taking the place of another celebrity. The public does not consider these matters from the same point of view as the artists. If Mme. Calvé, let us say, were to consent to appear in place of Miss Adams when the latter chanced to be indisposed, the public would be highly delighted and would not for an instant think that Mme. Calvé had done anything unworthy of her. If the part were Marguerite, Mme. Calvé's performance of it would be just as fine and would be just as much praised as if she had been originally announced to sing it.

Secondly, these singers are in a sense public servants, and should be glad to oblige the public. Again, the authority of the manager should be supreme. He should be able to name the singers, not the singers themselves. But owing to the fact that the star system does prevail in the company, the manager is not supreme, and the singers do have dictatorial powers. Mr. Grau cannot compel Mme. Eames to act as a substitute for Mme. Calvé if she is unwilling to do so. And yet the public throws all the blame on the manager's shoulders. If he makes an unwelcome change in the cast, he is the subject of many unkind comments. And he has finally had to accept the public's decision that the singer is the attraction.

Now, who puts the singer on such a pedestal that he rules the manager? The public. Opera in New York has been made profitable by Mr. Grau by the employment of combinations of the best singers in the world. Great casts have to be provided for all the operas. The people will not go to the Opera House to hear the works for their own sakes. They go to hear the singers sing them. The singers know this. They would have to be very stupid if they did not. Year in and year out they receive such glorification as is accorded to few persons in this world. They realize the potency of their personal attractiveness and they trade upon it. It is their understanding of the situation which enables them to demand such high salaries. They are paid enormous prices for their services. In spite of the fact that Mr. Grau controls the operatic field in this country and they cannot sing here unless they sing with him, he is at their mercy. Why? Because they, and not the masters who wrote the operas, are the idols of the public.

And so the whole thing works around a circle. Public adulation puts the singer on the throne of power and makes it impossible for Mr. Grau to order one important singer to take the place of another. Yet if one is indisposed and Mr. Grau does not produce another equally acceptable, the public demands the return of its money. There is only one way out of this situation, and that is to educate the public to look upon the opera as the attraction. Just how that is to be done is what the writer of this department of THE NEW YORK TIMES cannot tell. The production of new operas is the only thing which will teach a public to regard the opera as superior to the singer, but if Mr. Grau puts on a new work, the public promptly stays at home and waits to hear a "big cast" in "Les Huguenots." Furthermore, the frequent production of new works with a company composed of stars is impossible. The stars do not find it necessary to study new parts. The public will go to hear them year after year in the old ones. In the days of the German opera régime at the Metropolitan there was a system which made the presentation of new works practicable and which looked toward a permanency of the operatic institution in this city. But the public would not stand the inferior singing which used to be heard in those days. And so out went the Germans, and in came Mr. Grau and his constellation of stars. And now the public worships the stars, and the stars are all jealous of each other lest one shall get more of the worship than another. And the manager is ground between two millstones. He is an object of sympathy.

But the subscription is so large that he cannot lose any money. So, for this season at any rate, he will be safe in giving money back to those who have bought seats for any particular night. The subscribers will bear the burden. But how is this going to affect the subscription for next year?

The week which has just ended at the Metropolitan Opera House was not one of startling interest. To be sure some more new singers were revealed to the public, but they were not of the class which the dear public loves to worship. Signor Scotti, who made his début on Wednesday night in the title rôle of Mozart's immortal "Don Giovanni," proved to be a baritone in whom all the excellences of conventionality had been cultivated to the highest degree. He is a man of handsome exterior, and that will go far toward wiping out of the public mind any other shortcomings, if the public chances to discover them. Then he holds his head up very high, and that may be easily be taken for splendor of bearing. Holding the head up high is about all the dignity possessed by some of those who have the loudest voices in the Opera House. And indeed in the history of the world it will be found that holding the head up high and pretending not to see other people are two of the prime factors in making men respected.

Signor Scotti has a good voice. It is not one of the great organs of the world, but it is fresh and vigorous, and he does not abuse it. He sings with an easy throat, and therefore probably goes to bed with an easy conscience. His interpretation of the gay Lothario of Spain was elegant and graceful, but before the evening was over it proved to be entirely deficient in variety. He placed Don Giovanni in one key from beginning to end, and this is an absurdity not to be tolerated. However, he did nothing to shock polite society. He was not guilty of deep emotional force nor of high tragedy. Therefore he will probably be liked. The things that shock are regarded at the Metropolitan as the private and especial property of Emma Calvé. Those which thrill and move us to tears are reserved for the absent Jean. Ah, we love our Jean, even if the wicked Mr. Van Dyck does refer to him as a prima donna. But Mr. Van Dyck is safe from repartee. No one will ever say such things about him.

But to return. Signor Pini-Corsi, in spite of desperate attempts on the part of his predecessor to pave a wide path for his failure, was a success with the audience, though he showed the gentle refinements of a cantering calf in his comedy and sang like a man recovering from a cold which he had contracted in infancy. But he will be tolerable. The stage setting of "Don Giovanni" at the Metropolitan, I fear, never will be. The attempts to improve it are so mean that they are positively pitiable. For several years some of the critics have called attention to the incorrectness of the stage management in the ballroom scene and have said that it would not be hard to have at least the small orchestras on the stage which Mozart requires. Well, on Wednesday night we had them, but in such a way that they might have been at the bottom of the sea for all the effect they had in the scene. They were half hidden, and they did none of the little bits of stage business demanded to explain the purpose of their presence.

And the costumes of the accessories! From what museum did they come? From the wardrobe room of the Metropolitan Opera House, gentle reader. There is not such another museum of antiquities in this land. The Smithsonian Institution is a baby compared to it. But the eminent impresario at the head of the concern naturally says to himself: "My public does not come here to see the chorus; it comes to hear the famous artists of my company. So why should I dress my chorus in purple and fine linen?" But there are a few real music lovers among the persons who go to the Metropolitan, and it grieves them to see the works of the master treated as if they were simply frames for the glory of a few high-priced soloists. What sort of a treatment will the works of Mozart get in the forthcoming cycle, I wonder? Let us not undertake to penetrate the future. It seems to be a dark one for operatic art in this city. But for operatic money making perhaps it is not so bad.

From this time forward the season of music may perhaps progress smoothly. The opera will, of course, monopolize the attention of the public, and therefore there will not be as many concerts as there were at the outset of the Winter. The opera itself may perhaps improve as it goes on. Up to the present time the season at the yellow temple of personal glory in Upper Broadway has not been one of much brilliancy. Owing to Mr. Grau's policy of "barnstorming," as it is called in the theatrical business, several of his most useful people are on the sick list, and substitutions and changes of bill have marked the beginning of the series of entertainments. However, it is to be hoped that the sick will recover and that we shall not have to depend upon M. Alvarez for all our romance.

There are vague threats of a performance of "Tristan und Isolde" with the sharpwitted M. Van Dyck as the hero. No doubt the impresario, who hates Wagner, in spite of the fact that it pays, would be glad thus to prove that the music drama of Baireuth is not what it is said to be, but with the public clamoring for the return of its money on all occasions he is likely to be a little circumspect in his dealings. When he feels really sad and discouraged at the recalcitrant people and the noisy press, he can always seek surcease of sorrow in a Saturday night performance of "La Favorita," which, being translated, means "His Favorite Opera."

AMERICAN THEATRE.

The Castle Square Opera Company's holiday season of light opera at the American Theatre has been inaugurated with conspicuous success. The receipts of "The Beggar Student" have surpassed those of any previous light opera production at this popular theatre. "Die Fledermaus" ("The Bat") has been selected as the bill for next week, commencing Monday afternoon, Jan. 1, when a special New Year's Day matinée will be given. "Die Fledermaus," with its gay spirit and briskly melodious atmosphere, is the most popular and charming of all the light operas written by Johann Strauss, for its music is delightfully catchy, abounding in lyric gems and lively choruses, and its extremely amusing story is related in witty dialogue. The brilliantly spectacular second act, the scene of the masked ball in the palace of Prince Orlofski, promises to be the finest scenic investiture every displayed on the American Theatre stage. It will show a magnificently illumined ballroom, a conservatory, and a winter garden, the series of exquisite pictures utilizing the resources of the enlarged stage, which is now 60 feet in depth. A prettily costumed dance will be one of the effective incidents of this act. The dresses to be worn by principals and chorus will represent an unusually lavish outlay, and will be of pleasing variety in color and design. The cast will again include the light-opera favorites who have been already accorded a rousing welcome by the patrons of the Castle Square Opera Company. It has been arranged as follows: Eisenstein, Mr. Roberts; Alfred, Mr. Rhys Thomas, (his first appearance with the company in this city;) Frank, Mr. Stewart; Frosch, Mr. Moulan; Dr. Falke, Mr. Fleming; Blind, Mr. Meyeres; Rosalind, Miss Morgan and Miss Thorne; Adele, Miss Quinlan; Prince Orlofski, Miss D'Arcy. The light opera chorus which has distinguished itself during the past week by spirited vocalization, and spontaneity and grace in action, will again be heard to advantage in Strauss's rhythmic ensembles. Gilbert and Sullivan's charming opera "Iolanthe" is underlined for the week of Jan. 8. Spinelli's lyric tragedy "At the Lower Harbor" (a basso porto) will be presented for the first time in this city at the American Theatre on Jan. 22.

THE SEASON IN ROME.

Novelties in Opera in the Theatres of the Holy City.

ROME, Dec. 14.—The programme for this Winter's season of concerts at the Academy of Santa Cecilia has been issued this week. Among the principal attractions are concerts with Joachim, Eugen d'Albert, and Buonamici, the well-known Florentine pianist, a special concert of Russian music under the direction of Salomoff, one of Italian music by modern Italian composers, another large orchestral concert under the direction of the celebrated Bolognese director Martucci, and a "first performance" in Rome of Maestro Verdi's sacred music.

The programmes of the other large orchestral societies here, i. e., the Bach Society, the Philharmonic, and the Nuova Societa Orchestrale, under the leadership, respectively, of Maestro Costa, Pinelli, and Giovanni Sgambati, are not yet out, but promise to be as interesting as in past years.

The French Academy will also, in all probability, give some special concerts of modern music, under the direction of the "Prix de Rome" musicians of the Villa Medici, and with the aid of the abovementioned societies.

The Autumn season at the Costanzi closes on Friday with another performance of Pietro Mascagni's "Iris," which has lost none of the popularity which it gained at its initial performance here over a year ago, despite its constant repetitions. Wagner's "Lohengrin" commences the Winter programme at the same theatre on the 18th.

Giacomo Puccini is expected in Rome in a few days, and his new "La Tosca" will at once go into rehearsal under his own supervision.

There have been four "premières" of newly written works during the last ten days here—those of Collina's "La Fornarina" at the Quirino, Smargiia's "Falma" and I. Randegger's "Shade of Werther" at the Politiama Adriano, and the late Maestro Cataiani's "Vally" at the Costanzi. Although scarcely epoch-making works, these four new oratorios of the neo-Italian school are, one and all, quite worthy of performance, and contain much that is praiseworthy and fine. The most important of these productions is probably that of the lamented composer Cataiani, based as it is on a libretto by the well-known Luzi Delica. The work was given a fine performance under the direction of Leopoldo Mismoni, and met with a warm reception on the part of the numerous audience, its many beauties being thoroughly appreciated. Smargiia's creation, which once again shows the undoubted talent of this young Austrian composer, already well known through his "Nozze Ostriane," lacks the necessary support of a sufficiently dramatic and interesting libretto, despite the weirdness of its uncanny subject and the clever verses of the librettist.

Smargiia became first known to the musical world in general through the efforts of his admirer, Archduke Joseph of Austria, who procured him the favorable patronage of the Vienna Opera House some years ago. "The Shade of Werther" is the production of another Austro-Italian, Ignio Romdger, like Smargiia, a resident of Trieste, still under twenty years of age. Rather a shorter episode than an opera, the work has for its subject the appearance of Werther's ghost to Charlotte as she sits in her room on Christmas night reading the letters of her dead lover.

The duration of the whole piece is somewhat under forty-eight minutes, but in that time, aided by an intensely fantastic and strikingly dramatic libretto, Randegger, has given signs of considerable promise for the future, and his work was enthusiastically received. As to Collina's "Fornarina," it is perhaps the most popular of the four novelties, and has drawn large audiences to that very popular theatre, the Quirino.

Lack of space forbids a more detailed account of these new works, worthy as they are of notice, but the American public will undoubtedly be accorded an opportunity of judging one or two of them for itself before very long. Don Lounyi Perasi's fine oratorio, "The Resurrection of Christ," which traversed Europe amid such enthusiastic success a year ago, has been given a new performance in the Eternal City at the Church of the Apostles, and has been again received with the same admiration and warmth which were accorded it last December in the same temple.

That the work of this young priest, which has been so highly praised by the most competent critics of Vienna, Milan, Paris, and London, should have been received so coldly in the United States still remains a problem difficult to solve.

One of the coming novelties for the Winter in Sicily and Naples is an opera based on the American theme of "Miles Standish," music by a young South Italian composer, of whom I will speak later.

Leoncavallo's "Zaza" may perhaps be given a hearing here before very long, especially as this gifted composer has been reinstated in the favor of the Roman public by the great success of his "Bohème," which has been given at the Politéama of late, before crowded and enthusiastic audiences. Although this work has not been favored with the sudden and exceptional success of Puccini's setting of the same subject, it has been creeping steadily up on its formidable rival, and the recent successes at Paris have but confirmed the favorable judgment of the work, both here and in other cities of the peninsula.

Mascagni's new work, "Le Maschere," seems to be approaching completion, and although the libretto is of a fanciful and rather light character, it seems to bid fair to being an interesting creation, and will undoubtedly be hailed with joy by the myriads of admirers of this talented but injudicious composer.

Enrico Bossi of Venice has finished a long oratorio, which is to be given this week at the Riedel Verein, at Leipsic. T. M. P.

NOTES OF MUSIC.

Jefferson De Angelis and his comic opera company are to appear in "The Jolly Musketeer" at the Harlem Opera House during the week commencing Jan. 7.

The second symphony concert for young people, under the direction of and with explanations by Mr. Frank Damrosch, will be given in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 13. This series of concerts is arranged for those who wish to learn to listen intelligently to orchestral music.

The Seidl Society of Brooklyn will give an orchestral concert at the Academy of Music in that city on the evening of Jan. 4. Emil Paur will conduct and the soloist will be Dudley Buck, tenor, and August Walther, pianist. The principal numbers will be Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Liszt's piano concert in E flat, and the "Leonore" overture, 70, 111,

Mr. Walter Damrosch will give a lecture on Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" at Sherry's on Thursday, Jan. 18, at 3 P. M. He will have the assistance of Mme. Johanna Gadski, soprano, of the Metropolitan company, who will sing "Trauerne," the warning of Brangaene, and the death scene of Isolde.

Mr. Henry E. Hadley, composer-conductor, announces an evening of music at the Waldorf-Astoria Tuesday, Jan. 16. The programme will be made up almost exclusively of his own compositions, many of which will then be heard for the first time. Mr. Hadley will wield the baton over an orchestra of sixty selected musicians in the presentation of his instrumental numbers and Mr. David Bispham will interpret Mr. Hadley's songs. The concert will be under the direction of Victor Thrane.

The Pittsburg Orchestra of seventy players, Victor Herbert, conductor, will give two concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Tuesday evenings, Jan. 23 and Feb. 27. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Brema, who will then make her first appearance in New York this season. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture "Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Aria from "Castor et Pollux".....Rameau
Mme. Brema.
Symphony in E minor, No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
"Mephisto" waltz.....Liszt
Songs.
Mme. Brema.
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

Mr. Theodore Bjorksten announces the engagement of Mme. Gadski for the first concert of the Bach Singers to be given in Mendelssohn Hall Feb. 13, the previous arrangement with Mme. Schumann-Heink having fallen through, owing to the impossibility of agreement upon a date. At the second concert, on April 26, Mr. David Bispham will be the principal soloist. W. J. Henderson will be the lecturer at the first of the private lecture recitals to be held on Feb. 26.

At W. J. Henderson's second lecture on "The Classic and Romantic in Piano Music" at the New York College of Music on Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 3, Miss Florence Terrel will play compositions by Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, and Brahms.

MUSICAL MATTERS AT HOME

A movement is on foot to secure the creation by the Legislature of the office of State Director of Music for the public schools, and a bill to this effect will be presented early in January. A large number of prominent men of all businesses and professions have interested themselves in this matter, as have also many women well known through their connection with music, art, and other branches of education.

School statistics show that in over 80 per cent. of the towns and cities of Massachusetts music receives more attention from the pupils than any other single study, and it seems to be the general opinion in the educational centres of the State that not only should there be greater facilities offered for the attainment of a musical education, but also that this education should be of the same breadth in all parts of the State and that it should all be under the direction of some one official.

Under existing conditions, certain facilities for the study of music are, it is true, offered by the schools of almost every city and town, but there is no uniformity about them. Each community has its own standard, which may be high or low, according to circumstances. A competent State musical director, the supporters of the new movement urge, would find means of raising standards which are low and of maintaining those which are already satisfactory. With the growing interest in music, it is urged, the State owes it to itself as well as to the pupils of the schools to make as ample provision for successful instruction in this as in any other branch of education.

As the matter stands now, the direction of music, as of other departments of the school curriculum, is placed in the hands of the School Superintendents. It is not denied that the Superintendents, as a class, are conscientious and able men, and that they give their best efforts to their work, but naturally many of them have little practical knowledge of music.

A movement is on foot to organize a music festival in Philadelphia, to take place in May.

The Washington Choral Society began its seventeenth season on Tuesday last with "The Messiah." The Post said:

"Last night the society was assisted by Mrs. Charles Morton, soprano; Mr. Nicholas Douty, tenor; Miss Fielding Roselle, contralto, and Mr. David Bispham, bass. Chief interest centred in the latter, who was received with many manifestations of extreme pleasure. His rich, strong, deep voice was heard to unusual advantage, especially in the recitatives of the prophecies and the coming of the Lord of Hosts. Mrs. Charles Morton's soprano voice was pleasing and effective in the latter recitatives descriptive of the coming of the Messiah. Miss Fielding Roselle's contralto was a feature of the rendition most commendable, her clear voice possessing great tone and depth. Mr. Nicholas Douty, the tenor, sang with fire and spirit, and was most effective.

The large chorus of 150 voices was well trained, the members singing in unison and with precision. Never before has such good work been done by the Choral Society chorus in any of the previous presentations of "The Messiah." The "Hallelujah" chorus was especially well done. Mr. Josef Kaspar directed in his usual capable manner, while Mr. John Porter Lawrence was the organist. Mr. E. O. Eberhardt assisted with the cornet. The presentation as a whole was smooth and flawless, and judging from the size of the audience last night there will be an overflowing house present next Tuesday evening to hear "The Messiah" with Gadski.

A musical genius in the shape of a one-armed piano player made his appearance at a Norristown musicale the other night and scored an instantaneous success. Besides having a gentle touch, he played with great expression, and could undoubtedly make some of the two-handed Paderewskis look to their laurels. Dreamy waltzes are his forte. When playing marches, his educated member dashes from one end of the piano to the other like mad, and he presents rather a comical sight. Although he renders everything from "cakewalks" to the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," he doesn't know a note of music, but plays everything by ear. This unique player's name is William Everly, and his boast is that he has not been in one town more than two days in the last ten years. He has an expert advance agent, who makes it a point to get acquainted among the upper classes, and always manages to have dates ahead for the one-armed musical wonder.

Mr. Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last concert. The Journal said: "Mr. Paderewski was welcomed most heartily. He gave in many respects a most agreeable and I may say elegant performance of Beethoven's heroic concerto. For in connection with his interpretation the term 'elegant' may be fitly used. Whether this elegance suits Beethoven's music is another question. Mr. Paderewski's tone in passages of delicate beauty and moderate strength was, as of old, delightful. In passages that demand robust strength his tone was inclined to be forced and harsh. To praise his general technic, to dilate upon his use of the pedals at this day would be an impertinence. Occasionally there was extravagant elasticity in rhythm, so that there was for the moment little or no rhythm. It is needless to say that he was tumultuously applauded. He responded to the demand and played a barcarolle by Rubinstein in such curious fashion that the piece was hardly to be recognized."

The Philharmonic Orchestra of forty pieces, the only large organized orchestra in Philadelphia, has been directed by the Academy of Fine Arts to cease the Thursday afternoon concerts at that institution. The cause of the cessation of the concerts is the attitude taken by the Tax Department, which has ruled that, inasmuch as the institution is exempt from city taxes, it has no right to exact the admission fee of 25 cents charged for the entertainment. It having been found impossible to continue the concerts gratis, they have been stopped, for the first time in twenty years. A suit is now pending between the officers of the academy and the Board of Revision of Taxes as to the city's right to tax the institution.

The programme of the fifth concert of the Pittsburg Orchestra yesterday was as follows: Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, Bosi's concerto in A minor for organ and orchestra, Tschaikowsky's "Casse Noisette" suite, two organ solos, and Thomas's overture to "Mignon." The soloist was Clarence Eddy, the eminent organist.

***

The programme for the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday was as follows: Moszkowski's first suite, Horatio W. Parker's "Northern Ballad," (first time,) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS ABROAD

A special dispatch from Paris to The Chicago Daily News says: "The Grand Opera Company narrowly escaped losing the right to perform Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger' Saturday. According to the regulations, all works must receive at least one representation annually, else they pass out of the company's repertory. As 'Die Meistersinger' had not been performed since Jan. 1, the Directors of the opera billed it for Saturday night. The house was crowded, but shortly before the hour when the performance ought to begin it was discovered that the orchestral parts of the first and second violins had disappeared. This was at first thought to be some stupid joke, but as time passed no trace of the missing music could be discovered.

"Finally, when the impatience of the audience reached the demonstrating point, the stage carpenter found them hidden in an elevator. Active search is being made for the culprit, as it is believed it had been planned to prevent the representation of the work so it would disappear from the repertory. The Wagner troubles do not seem to be over, even yet."

Mr. Runciman says, in The Saturday Review: "Until four or five years ago we had to put up with playing that was not merely now and again perfunctory, but always and consistently perfunctory. It was reckoned the proper thing for a conductor to compel his band to be perfunctory. It was the tradition, handed down from the old time before us. In the beginning of this century such a thing as a conductor was unknown; the first fiddler used to beat time with his bow when things got very bad indeed, and a gentleman at the piano used to bang when it seemed more necessary than usual to pull the men together. Then Mendelssohn came, and confined himself to getting over the thin ice as rapidly as possible; not a story has come down to us to show that he once took the trouble to interpret a work conscientiously. Then, after Mendelssohn, Wagner came, and got the reputation of being mad because he really wanted to interpret orchestral works as faithfully and beautifully as Liszt, for instance, interpreted pianoforte works. So Wagner was dismissed, (he must indeed have been mad to dream of persuading the Philharmonic Directors that artistic interpretations were things to be desired;) and for a long time the London musical world rolled on as usual. Then Richter came, and that began the breaking up of the old order; and many years after Richter, Mottl came; and finally Mr. Newman put Mr. Wood in power, and Mr. Wood has made the old style of conducting impossible. Could Wagner attend one of Mr. Wood's concerts he would be surprised at the development of orchestral playing here. Not only do our bandsmen keep time and play with expression; but the desire for clean phrasing, perfect and strong accent, clean tone, has resulted in such refinements of bowing as you may see at Queen's Hall, where the four-and-twenty fiddlers move their arms with a unanimity so marvelous as to suggest that they are automata worked by one string pulled by Mr. Wood. The mass of wind players play solidly together on occasion, but when solos occur they are delivered with a beauty and a virtuosity that in the old days one would have expected only from a virtuoso. Most of our players are virtuosos; the astonishing thing is that in broad little passages they play into one another's hands in a spirit so loyal to the conductor."

Aldo Antonjetti, a young and very talented violinist, who received his education at the Royal Academy of Music, and has played a few times in London, has been engaged as the soloist at one of the Dresden symphony concerts during next year's season.

The recent Worcester Festival resulted in a profit of £288, and this sum, together with £907 collected at the cathedral doors, will be added to the fund for the benefit of the clergy orphans and widows of the diocese. The total expenses of the festival were £4,300, of which sum the principal vocalists and conductor took £1,800. On the face of it there is no margin for the extra orchestral and choral rehearsals which were plainly needed. Two hundred and eighty-eight pounds would not go far in that direction if a balance is to be left for charity.

One of Richard Strauss's symphonic poems, which are almost as elaborate as symphonies, is usually considered quite enough for a programme. At a recent Munich concert, however, four of them were heard, but the composer himself conducted, and that insured their success.

***

The symphonic poem, "Heldenlied," by Dvorak, was a complete fiasco in Berlin, where it recently had its first production. The critics call it "an unfortunate and feeble" composition. The composer was so discomfited by his failure that he ran away from interviewers, and has not since been seen in public.

The British Museum authorities are preparing an interesting series of musical treatises, the first being on Beethoven and Wagner, and dealing, it is said, with everything upon the subject to be found in the Museum library. Handel, and it is believed some British musicians, are to follow later on.

The death of Mr. Paul Moller, organist and choirmaster of Stora Raby Church, in the south of Sweden, brings to light a remarkable life. Mr. Moller was ninety-one years of age at the time of his death, and had held his position at Stora Raby Church for a period of seventy-two years, during which time he never missed a service nor went away for a holiday. Mr. Moller was a member of a musical family that, for the last 200 years, from father to son, had held the post of organist and choirmaster of Stora Raby Church.

Apropos to a recent performance of "The Magic Flute" in London, has been unearthed a criticism which appeared many years ago in The National Standard. Special interest attaches to the notice because it was attributed to Thackeray. Here it is: "One night last week we stretched ourselves along three empty benches at Covent Garden Theatre to hear the horrid parody—the absurd burlesque—which goes under the name of 'Zauberflöte.' We must do justice to Messrs. Dobler and Hertz, as well as to Mme. Schroeder, by saying that they sustained their parts most ably; but for the rest—the company of hideous screech owls, which Bunn or some other gentleman of equally good taste has collected at Covent Garden—the quaverings of a cracked ballad singer, the screams of Miss Pearson herself, are melody to the howls of these high Dutch monsters. This is candid criticism, but relatively acceptable to the performers when compared with the sketch which follows, showing a trio of indescribably unlovely women—hump-backed, coarse, with teeth protruding from ugly mouths, and in dresses whose formlessness would cause a Whitechapel washerwoman to blush for shame—serenading, each bearing a palm branch. The three boys, who advise and instruct and lead Tamino in his wanderings, and who, whenever he is in doubt or fear, inspire him by their presence and console him with their sweet minstrelsy, were enacted by a round-faced old woman, with two Jewesses. They stuttered under the songs and staggered under the weight of their enormous palm branches, vying in discord with the 'attendants of the Queen of Night.'"

In the new German version of the letters of Liszt to the Princess Wittgenstein there is a curious suggestion made by Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. The Duke wrote to Liszt to ask whether Richard Wagner would undertake the orchestration of his newest opera, adding: "I understand that Richard Wagner is not very busy and that his situation is not very brilliant. Perhaps it would be agreeable to him to make £100 in a few months." The opera, no doubt, was "Santa Chiara," which later on was heard at Covent Garden, and in the last act of which somebody had to sing a duet with a resuscitated corpse. Who really orchestrated the Duke's opera is still a secret. It would have been a funny work, indeed, if Wagner himself had consented to perform that office.

It does not often fall to the experience of a prima donna to sit in a lifeboat ready to escape from a burning ship. Mme. Marie Brema of the Covent Garden Company has been singing Brangäne, in "Tristan," in Paris, and on returning to England she was a passenger by the Mabel Grace, which collided with an Italian steamer, and subsequently caught fire off Folkestone. The weather was severe, and it was deemed desirable to give the passengers life belts. Mme. Brema being one of those who were put in the lifeboat until the fire was extinguished and the women were taken on board again. She says: "A poor sailor was lost, another killed, and a third had his leg broken. It is terrible, the sea!" She happily was none the worse for her experience, and speaks in very high terms of the bravery of the officers and crew of the vessel.

A STARTLING DISCLOSURE.

How Mr. Grau Saves Money by Not Engaging Certain Singers.

The following remarkable letter was received some days ago at this office. The musical editor of THE TIMES at first hesitated to publish it, but having learned that although it is dated Milan, Dec. 1, it was in this country on Dec. 7, he has decided that it contains alarming intelligence, as well as literary merit, which should not be suppressed:

Milano, December 1st, 1899.

Dear Sir: A friend of mine sent me the enclosed notice [a newspaper clipping], who proves that Mr. Grau is on a wrong path. Paying a little attention at the Organization of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company for the Season 1899-900 it is easy to know that Mr. Grau introduced in his management such economy that will cause him very soon the general disappointement of the good American Critics. The tenor Jean De Reszke, the great favourite of the American public, was replaced by Mr. Alvarez who cost less 1000 Dollars every performance, and gives a total economy during the Season of 50.000 Dollars.

Mme Sembrich costs 400 Dollars less than Mme. Melba and gives a total economy of 20.000 Dollars.

The baritone Maurel who received a salary of 600 Dollars per performance was substituted by Signor Scotti who receives only 400 Dollars a week. A little economy of Dollars 300 monthly was introduced engaging the baritone Pini-Corsi to sing baritone and also buffo rôles. Another economy of Dollars 600 monthly was obtained engaging Mr. Hinricks as conductor at the place of Mr. Bevignani.

What will be the result? Let me give only a few comparisons.

Mr. Alvarez is surely a good tenor but not to be compared with the Great Jean De Reszke. Great as singer and great as Actor.

Mme Sembrich too she is a Great singer, but she has not the silver and beautiful voice of Mme Melba, and not the magnetic power upon the public which Mme Melba possesses. Signor Scotti is a young artist who, even possessing good artistic requisities, presently do not possess all what the public has the right to demand from an artist who takes the place of another artist of a great reputation like Mr. Maurel. About the new engaged Signor Pini-Corsi is a regular baritone with a strong voice but not well cultivated. His stage presence as baritone is very poor, and his acting as buffo is rough, clownish and not to be compared with the intelligent acting and genuinely humor of the admirable buffo Signor Carhohe. What do you think about Mr. Hinricks as conductor at the place of Mr. Bevignani?

I know Mr. Hinricks as a late Manager and antiartistic conductor of a misfortunate opera Company who many time was forced to sing from his chair in orchestra to replace the chorus and such artist that, refused to sing because impayed!! Mr. Hinricks can be compared with Mr. Bevignani, the aristocratic and wellknow conductor of the Royal Opera Covent Garden in London, and Grand Opera in St. Petersburg? Certainly no! I think it is enough to convince everybody that the present organization of the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company is rather inferior of the magnificent ensemble of all the other last opera Season, when there was engaged Patti, Melba, Jean de Reszke, Lassal

Some Happenings in Good Society.

As has been the case for some fifteen years past, or since the good old custom of New Year's calling ceased to be, the new year finds New York society, or at least that portion of it which is young enough to actively participate in gayety, out of town. The interest of the gay world centres this morning and will remain centred through to-morrow in the doings and life at Tuxedo, Ardsley, Knollwood, Westchester, Hempstead, Baltusrol, Staten Island, Orange, and in numerous other smaller suburbs which can boast of a country club. At these country clubs there have assembled, as well as in the country houses about them which still remain open or have been open for the New Year holidays, a large number of the men and women who find a seeming novelty in exchanging city for country pleasures in the Winter. These are devoting themselves, where possible, to skating and coasting, riding, driving, and golfing during the daylight hours, and after the darkness falls to dining, dancing, and making merry around wide hearths wherein the fire logs blaze the evening through. The new year, fortunately, is a happier one to the manifold interests affected by Wall Street's condition than it promised a week ago to be, and the day in this way may atone for the gloominess of Christmas Day.

***

New York society enters to-morrow upon the last two months of its Winter season, prepared to enjoy itself to the utmost. The improved conditions in Wall Street, which have had their natural effect, make the outlook for the remainder of the season more cheerful than that of a week ago, and several families who had begun to plan for departures to the South and the Riviera or Egypt in early January are now wavering in their plans. It is possible that the returning wave of cheerfulness may make the Winter much more gay than had been anticipated.

***

Differing from last year at this time, when there were several large balls on the near social horizon, there is only one of these entertainments definitely announced, and this is to be given by Mrs. Astor, Sr., on Jan. 29. Last year Mrs. Astor gave her annual ball on Jan. 10, and it followed by three days the notable ball given by Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Sr. There are several dinner dances rumored, but the departure of Mrs. John Jacob Astor and other prominent young matrons, and the coming departure, also for Europe, of Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs, may make these comparatively few in number. This departure may also lead to the abandonment of the subscription cotillions organized by Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., Mrs. Orme Wilson, Mrs. Francis K. Pendleton, Mrs. W. Starr Miller, Mrs. Ogden Mills, Mrs. John Jacob Astor, and the then Mrs. Henry Sloane last year, and which it was then understood were to be continued. The first of them was danced at Sherry's on Jan. 5, 1899. Mrs. John Jacob Astor, as has been said, has left for Europe; Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., and another of last year's patronesses, with Mrs. W. Starr Miller, are in mourning, so that only Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Pendleton, and Mrs. Mills are left of last year's subscribers and organizers to give a second dance this year. A series of dinner dances to be organized by Mrs. Gerry, Mrs. Morton, Mrs. Cutting, and Mrs. Pendleton are also rumored.

***

The first large notable private entertainment of January will be the dance to be given by Mrs. John R. Drexel at Sherry's on the evening of Jan. 8. As already announced in this column, Miss Ellen Drexel Paul, daughter of James W. Paul, Jr., and the most prominent débutante of the season in Philadelphia, will be the guest of honor at this dance. There are to be two cotillion leaders, Miss Paul dancing with Mr. Nielson and Mrs. Drexel with the other leader, and the favors will be exceptionally handsome. This dance will, however, not be a very large one, and the guests will be chiefly of the fashionable Newport set. It is probable that Mrs. George Crocker will give a ball a little later in the season in her new and handsome Fifth Avenue palace for her daughters, the Misses Rutherford, and it is rumored that private balls will be given at Sherry's by the parents of two of the most prominent débutantes of the Winter. Mrs. Whitelaw Reid will give a dance at her residence, on Madison Avenue, on Jan. 12 for her niece, Miss Mary Crocker of San Francisco.

***

It looks, however, more as if the Winter would be what is called a débutantes' Winter, to be filled with comparatively small dances in private houses for the Winter's buds and their friends than of large dinner dances or private balls. The second Assembly ball, which will take place late this month, is the only large subscription ball which the Winter will bring.

***

Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish will give three entertainments at her Madison Avenue residence on successive Saturday evenings, Jan. 13, 20, and 27. The first of these will be a musicale, the second a vaudeville entertainment, and the third a cotillion.

***

Miss Callender and Miss De Forest have, it is said, abandoned the idea of giving this season the large musicales with which their names have become associated in past years, and will instead give at their beautiful apartment a series of receptions. While there is general and natural regret expressed over this news, it occasions little surprise, for people have wondered how these gracious hostesses could undergo the fatigue and trouble of arranging such large affairs, which have been so much appreciated, not only by musicevers but by society in general Winter after Winter. Musicales, however, will be a feature of the remainder of the Winter season, and the presence of the Metropolitan company makes, of course, these all the more possible for people possessed of long purses who can secure operatic stars to sing at their houses.

***

January will bring a number of weddings. Mr. Wendell Baker and Miss Jeanne Held will be married to-morrow at St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square, at noon; on Wednesday the wedding of Mr. Edward Manierre and Miss Elizabeth Hunt Welling will take place at Calvary Church at noon, and Mr. Edward McVickar and Miss Edith Lawrence Speyers will be married in the Church of the Holy Communion on Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 17. Miss Speyers's maid of honor will be Miss Cornelia Van Rensselaer Robb, and her bridesmaids are to be the Misses Julia Walsh of Albany, Selina Schroeder, a cousin of Miss Speyers, Mary Vibbert, daughter of the Rev. Dr. B. Vibbert, and Miss Mabel Jones. Miss Welling's maid of honor will be Miss Mary Welling, sister of the bride, and Mr. George H. Sullivan will be Mr. Manierre's best man. The ushers will be Messrs. R. W. G. Welling, Edward Casey, Herbert Thompson, J. E. Burnet, and Francis E. Ward. Mr. Lou's Ogden and Miss Augusta McKim Davies will be married in St. Bartholamew's on April 25.

***

The events and incidents of the past week have been duly described and noted from day to day in this column, and, therefore, need little repetition. The week was a particularly gay one for the children and very young people, who have been continually and continuously on the go, and many of whom are paying the penalty of too much dissipation and too late hours, this morning. There were Christmas trees innumerable, beginning with a fine one at Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs's on Christmas afternoon and continuing through the week. One of the most enjoyable entertainments for children during the week was the afternoon of vaudeville given on Thursday by the managers of the Exchange for Woman's Work, and for the benefit of the Exchange, at Wallack's Theatre, which was crowded with little tots and children of a larger growth, who laughed at Marshall P. Wilder, trained dogs, and sleight-of-hand performers, and enjoyed the cinematograph and other features.

***

The opera is more of a novelty this New Year's time than it was last year, when it had been running for nearly six weeks. Now it is only a fortnight since the first performance, and so the boxes have all been occupied at every production, except on Christmas night, and the parquet and lower balcony seats have been filled. It is evident, however, that opera is now looked upon more as a fixed feature of the season. The majority of the parquet and balcony seats are taken by subscribers for the season, and the great public, which, even last year, and through former years, thronged the Opera House evening after evening, and filled the lobbies, is not so much in evidence, except possibly on some great night with a phenomenal cast. The dressing has not been especially notable, save on the first night, and it is evident that Monday is the fashionable night par excellence, with Wednesday a close second, and Friday a bad third.

These conditions may change as the season progresses, for the last two Friday nights have been on the eve of holidays, with a resultant absence of many well known people in the country. Mrs. Astor, Sr., has been very faithful in her attendance, and on the last few evenings some of the Vanderbilt connections, notably Mr. and Mrs. James A. Burden, Jr., have made their appearance. It is evident that the fashionable period of mourning in New York is growing shorter all the time, and the appearance of men at fashionable functions, perhaps within a week of the death of a near relative, no longer seems to excite even comment, while women are seen in society within a month after a near relative's death.

***

From all indications New York is to lose within a very few weeks a number of people whose absence will be decidedly felt in the gayeties of the season. The "East is calling" more loudly, it appears, this year than ever before, and the departure of Col. John Jacob Astor and Mrs. Astor will it is reported be followed by that of many of their friends, bound for the Riviera and Egypt. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Lawrence (Miss Willing) will soon sail to spend the Winter in the south of France, and the Mediterranean boat on Jan. 9 will take out a large number of well-known people, including Mr. and Mrs. Clement C. Moore, Mrs. William F. Burden, and Mrs. Frederic Neilson and her daughter, Miss Katherine Neilson. Mrs. Adolph Ladenburg has already sailed, and Mr. Harold Vanderbilt, accompanied by his mother, sailed yesterday.

***

It is not Europe only that is enticing fashionable New Yorkers away. Aiken and even the Florida resorts are beginning to call their votaries. The Aiken colony will be unusually large this Winter. Its advance guard has already arrived there, and the rest of the small army who love to Winter there will soon follow. New York has grown so large and its society circles have widened so much that the movements of even the most prominent and influential men and women no longer absolutely determine a season's gayety or the lack of the same. These spring from deeper conditions, but "that's another story."

***

The New Year's parties are quite as numerous as those of Christmas. Lenox is very gay, and the Anson Phelps Stokeses have opened Shadow Brook, where they have a very large party over the holidays. There were many jolly house parties at Meadow Brook and on Long Island, which lasted during a greater part of the week. Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Beach had one and Mr. and Mrs. Albert Stevens had a family gathering at their pretty home near Westbury. Mr. William C. Whitney was at his farm during the week, and Sidney Paget paid his round of farewell visits on Monday, prior to going to England to enlist for service in the South African war. The party at Biltmore, George Vanderbilt's country place in North Carolina, broke up just after the holiday, and Mr. and Mrs. H. McK. Twombly returned to this city. They will soon go abroad. Mr. and Mrs. Seward Webb have still a large party at Shelburne Farms. Mrs. William H. Leggett's Christmas holiday house party at Ridgeley Manor broke up yesterday. Mrs. Leggett's guests had a most enjoyable time.

The Earl and Countess of Minto are giving a large house party at Ottawa. The Earl of Cassilis is one of the party. He expects to return to New York by Jan. 12.

Mrs. Adolph Ladenburg, who has gone to England to hunt with the Quorn Club, at Melton Mowbray, has expressed her intention of taking a cottage at Warrenton, Va., where she will be for a couple of months next Autumn. This is the result of an expedition made by the Meadow Brook Hunt to Warrenton just before Christmas. The hunt went and returned in a special car, and so much pleased were the members with the country that they have arranged to have a number of meets down there next Autumn.

The Harvard Club is to give a reception to the officers and members of the Princeton Club of New York at its clubhouse, 27 West Forty-fourth Street, on Saturday evening, Jan. 13. The Princeton Club will give a reception to the University Football team and to the coaches and Faculty of the Committee on Athletics at the clubhouse on Saturday evening, Jan. 6. The entertainment will be a smoker with some vaudeville features and a supper.

***

The fifth annual Hungarian peasant ball, which will be held in Madison Square Garden this evening, promises to have quite a large society attendance, as several prominent women have taken boxes. The ball will open at midnight. It will be preceded by a sacred concert, which will begin at 9 o'clock.

***

The first meeting of the season of the Knickerbocker Bowling Club will be held on Wednesday, March 7, at the Tennis Building, 212 West Forty-first Street. The managers for this year are Messrs. William MacNeven Purdy, Matthew Astor Wilkes, J. Hooker Hamersley, Walter Rutherfurd, and Cortlandt S. Van Rensselaer. The officers of the club for 1900 are as follows: President—J. Hooker Hamersley; Vice President—Matthew A. Wilkes; Secretary—Cortlandt S. Van Rensselaer; Treasurer—Walter Rutherfurd. The patronesses are Mesdames Clement C. Moore, Philip Rhinelander, Philip J. Sands, Henry I. Barbey, Byam K. Stevens, Frederick Sheldon, Frederick J. de Peyster, George L. Kingsland, and Prescott Hall Butler.

***

The meeting of the Alumni of St. Paul's School, which, by an error, it was stated would be held at the Medico-Legal Society Building, 17 West Forty-third Street, last Wednesday evening, will be held there on Wednesday evening next, Jan. 3. This meeting will be largely attended by many prominent men who are graduates from St. Paul's School and resident in New York.

***

Mr. and Mrs. Jules S. Bache, who have recently moved into their new residence, 8 East Sixty-seventh Street, and which in appointments and furnishings is one of the handsomest of New York modern houses, have issued cards for "at homes" on Fridays, Jan. 12, 19, and 26, and Sundays, Jan. 14, 21, and 28.

***

The second Assembly of the "Wednesday Cotillion" will occur on Wednesday evening, Jan. 3, at Delmonico's, where two entire floors, that of the ballrooms and the one above, will be used. A unique and to many a pleasant feature of these entertainments is that the dancing of the cotillion precedes the supper, perhaps on the principle of "business first and pleasure after."

The engagement is again widely reported of a well-known society girl, daughter of a very prominent family, and a wealthy widower, and it is said the wedding may occur any day.

The opening dance of the fourth season of the Cinderella Cotillions took place at Dodworth's last Thursday evening. It was a most charming affair, and many débutantes were among the dancers. The favors and figures in the german were of a Yuletide nature and very pretty. The dances of this class are more like those in a private house than is usual in subscription dances. The patronesses receiving were Mrs. E. Sturges Mason, Mrs. S. Charles Welsh, Mrs. George Pryor Johnson, Mrs. William A. Parke, Mrs. Charles H. Van Brunt, Mrs. Arthur L. Rost, Mrs. James K. O. Sherwood, Mrs. Thomas Dimond, Mrs. David Oliphant Haynes, and Mrs. Horace S. Ely. The committee in charge, as heretofore, consisted of Edward B. Ripsom, A. Montgomery Johnson, Frederic Andress, Wendel Andress, Henry K. White, Jr., and Theddore N. Ripsom. The next dance of the series will occur Jan. 1.

The new villa being built of Mr. and Mrs. Edward J. Berwind at Newport will not be completed for at least twenty months. So much work in the building line is in progress at Newport that the working people there have had a prosperous Winter. The weather thus far has been mild. Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs's villa on the Cliffs, to be known as Rose Cliffs, will be completed and furnished and ready for occupancy late next June. Mr. Lispenard Stewart is having interior improvements made to his cottage, White Lodge, and the Baldwin cottage, on the left side of White Lodge, is being materially improved and enlarged. Mr. and Mrs. W. Storrs Wells are spending over $100,000 in the remodeling of their cottage, on Bellevue Avenue, Newport, and when the work is completed early in April decorators will take possession of the cottage and decorate the new ballroom, dining and open hall, the library, and reception rooms, all of which, as well as the apartments of Mr. and Mrs. Wells, will be entirely new.

Mr. H. D. Auchincloss is adding to his Newport estate one of the largest Italian gardens in this country, and with a small lake included. A large arbor is being erected over the sunken garden part, which affords a view of the entire garden. The measurement of the sunken garden part is 300 by 400 feet. The Keene estate on the avenue, purchased recently by Mrs. Richard Gambrill, has been cleaned off and staked out for the new villa which Mrs. Gambrill intends to build there very shortly, and which will be one of the handsomest cottages on the avenue. Mr. A. M. Coats has had work begun on his cottage, on Brenton Road, which is to be of Colonial architecture, and this new cottage is to be completed and ready for occupancy about the middle of June. Mr. Robert Sedgwick, who has taken the Lyman cottage on Le Roy Avenue for a long term of years, has begun very attractive improvements to the place. Miss Hattie Gammell, who has remained at her cottage since her runaway accident, has decided to go abroad next month to spend the Winter in the south of France.

Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt gladdened the hearts of the messenger boys of Newport on Christmas day with money gifts to each. Miss Blatchford has left Newport for New York. About fourteen additional working days will complete the new polo grounds for the West Chester Polo Club. Mr. Hamilton B. Tompkins paid a visit to Newport during the week with his brother, Mr. Frederick Tompkins. The Hill colony gave a subscription dance in Newton's Hall, Newport, last evening.

The season in Washington so far has been dull. The holidays are always gay for the débutantes, of whom there are a number this year. The presence of the college men has brought on an average of a ball each night for the fashionable younger set. The Princeton Glee and Banjo Clubs gave a charming concert last week. The Lafayette Square Theatre was beautifully decorated with orange and black flags and banners, and the audience a representative society one, all the women being in low-neck gowns or dresses of light color. A ball followed, given by the Alumni of the city, which was a great success. The President received the Sons of Nassau at a private reception, an honor never before shown to a body of university men. As they left the audience, these young Americans showed their appreciation of this graciousness by a rousing Princeton cheer, given on the front portico of the Executive Mansion.

"The Admiral of the Navy" and Mrs. Dewey are to be given a reception on Jan. 19 by Mr. and Mrs. John R. McLean, and "music" is on the card. As Mrs. McLean always has some of the grand opera singers over from New York, it will probably be a notable concert. Their beautiful ballroom, opening into a magnificent banqueting hall, enable them to entertain on a lavish scale.

***

The old custom of New Year's calling is an institution firmly established in Washington. After the annual breakfast given by the Secretary of State to the diplomats, the streets are full of uniformed officers and "dips" driving to the White House, Cabinet houses, and Embassies. Again, unfortunately, Admiral Dewey has given occasion for some social criticism by his decision to receive, as the recognized head of the navy, at his mother-in-law's, Mrs. Washington McLean's, instead of in his own house, which is understood to be "too small" for the occasion. Fifty débutantes and "one-year-out" girls are to assist Mrs. Dewey. As most people wanted to go especially to see the interior of the much-talked-of "Dewey house," this has caused much comment, which is to be deplored.

***

Mrs. Postlethwaite, daughter of Mr. Ellis, well known in Newport, gave a dance on Friday night at Rauscher's Hall, in Washington, and Mrs. Charles Bell, Mrs. Gen. Greely, Mrs. Curry, Mrs. Mackay-Smith, and other prominent women have been the hostesses at handsome balls during the week. The Paymaster General and Mrs. Bates, having opened their Washington house again after their return from London, where Mr. Bates was Military Attaché, brought their youngeset daughter out in a charming Southern manner on Christmas Day, at a large tea, and gave one of their jolly dances for the younger element in the evening. The house, a large one, was entirely decorated in Christmas greens, and a huge, gaily adorned Christmas tree greeted one at the entrance. Mrs. Ffoulke, whose daughter is by far the most beautiful of the Washington "buds," will give a domino ball on New Year's night, which will be a novelty in the formal society of the capital. Only forty women are asked, and many more men, and a cotilion will be danced after the unmasking at 1 o'clock. The meeting of the Chevy Chase hounds at Twin Oaks, Mr. Charles Bell's country seat on Woodley Lane, last week, was a spirited sight. The pink coats of the riders and the pretty traps of the onlookers, dotted over the lawn, suggested an English scene.

"Bob" Wallach (since the war a Second Lieutenant and stationed right in Washington, too,) brought over a squad of soldiers from Fort Myer, who, with their splendid horsemanship and their picturesque uniforms, added to the sporting effect.

Until the first snowstorm of the Winter, which began yesterday, in Washington, the Autumn has been so perfect there that the golf clubs have been unusually attractive. At the Washington Golf Club, where Miss Maud Wetmore holds the championship for women, several cups have been put up for the ladies and disputed for with much enthusiasm. One can golf all Winter in Washington, and it is the only city so far North where the climate permits of this. Even in Baltimore the Country Club closes the links during the Winter months. A number of dinners have already been given, and the invitations to the Bachelor cotillions, the most exclusive balls of the season, are out, in spite of which the season is unusually slow in starting. Owing to the war in South Africa a gloom hangs over the British Embassy, usually the centre of entertaining during the Yuletide festivities, and always the most hospitable house of the diplomatic circle.

Washington can boast of a new beau in Mr. William Astor Chanler, Congressman from New York, who has taken a charming house there, and who, if he lives up to the reputation which preceded him, will prove an acquisition indeed. Washington expects a great deal in the way of entertaining from Senator Depew, who has taken Corcoran House, the scene of so much gayety during the Brice reign. Two New York women who have established themselves in Washington for the Winter are distinct additions to society—Mrs. Cowles, née Roosevelt, a sister of Gov. Roosevelt, well known in New York and universally popular wherever she has lived, and Mrs. Reginald De Koven of New York.

Lord Pauncefote entertained Sir Henry Irving at luncheon at the embassy in Washington on Tuesday, and Postmaster General Smith asked most of the members of the Cabinet to meet the distinguished English actor yesterday at a luncheon. The guests included Secretaries Hay, Gage, Root, Long, and Hitchcock, and Senators Lodge, Elkins, and Burrows, Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, and others. All society has turned out nightly to see Miss Terry and Henry Irving once more. In fact, the seats for all of their performances have been sold.

As far as social matters go in Baltimore, the old year is going out there in a blaze of glory. At the Christmas night german of the Junior Cotillion Club numerous young people, as well as their chaperons, were present. The hall was decorated with greens, holly, and mistletoe. Mr. Carroll Brown led the cotillion. Among the many present were Mr. and Mrs. Carryl Bryan, Dr. and Mrs. Dorsey Coale, Mr. and Mrs. Tunstall Smith, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Jackson, Dr., and Mrs. Frank Martin, Dr. and Mrs. Trimble, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Redwood, Mr. and Mrs. George T. M. Gibson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Lee, the Misses Lee, Fisher, Brown, Pleasants, Wilson, Boykin, Ridgely, McKim, Hollins, Brune, Peter, Preston, Sinclair, O'Donovan, Robinson, and others; also the Messrs. On Tuesday evening a dance gotten up for the Home of the Incurables was given at Lehman's Hall, Baltimore. It was chaperoned by Mrs. Lyman Josephs, Mrs. E. Calvin Williams, Mrs. Clark, Mrs. Trimble, Mrs. Fisher, Mrs. Lee, Mrs. Hoffman, and Mrs. O'Donovan. On Tuesday evening also the Misses Harris gave a large theatre party at the Academy, and a supper afterward at the Mount Vernon Hotel. It was chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. Pemberton Pleasants. Among the débutantes present were Miss Virginia Wilson, Miss Boykin, Miss May Brown, Miss Ridgely, Miss Preston, Miss Lee, Miss Brune, Miss Peter, Miss Munnikhuysen, Miss Latrobe, and Miss Alice Pitts. On Wednesday afternoon Mrs. John Emory gave a large tea in honor of her débutante daughter.

Mrs. Robert Garrett gave, as is her custom, a large dinner to the messenger boys of the District Telegraph offices on Christmas. Mrs. Garrett had as her assistants in the good work Mrs. Richard Irvin of New York, Mrs. Hollins McKim, and Miss Sidney Price.

The old New Year's custom of calling is in a measure revived in Baltimore. On Monday many women will give receptions, and there will also be some informal "at homes." The Arundel Club will have luncheon all day for its members and—rare privilege for a woman's club—each member can bring a man with her. Perhaps the President's good example of becoming engaged has made the club more hospitably inclined toward mankind. The President, Miss Elizabeth T. King, will marry in February William M. Ellicott.

A large reception on New Year's Day in Baltimore will be that of Mrs. Howard Munnikhuysen in honor of her daughter, Miss Lily Munnikhuysen. Later in January Mrs. Munnikhuysen will give a dance for the younger members of society only. Mrs. Munnikhuysen also gave a theatre party last Wednesday evening in honor of Miss Laura Patterson Swan. Mrs. Robert Morison has sent out cards for a ball to be given Jan. 11 in honor of her débutante daughter, Miss Eleanor Morison. Among the Baltimoreans who have been spending the past week in New York are Mr. and Mrs. Frances M. Jencks. Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Tyson have finally closed their country home, Cylburn, and will spend the remainder of the Winter at their Baltimore town house.

Christmas week is never very gay, in a social sense, anywhere. It is entirely given over to the younger members of the family who are at home for the holidays. The English people celebrate Christmas more in the spirit of the olden time than perhaps do any other nation except the Germans. In Paris the New Year answers to our Christmas; in Russia the festival is a great religious feast, and in Spain and Italy and Austria it is the Church more than the people which celebrates. So much has been said of the gloom in England this season that to add the usual sentence this week would be idle and wearisome repetition. Yet there was some semblance of Christmas in Great Britain. The Duke and Duchess of Devonshire have opened Chatsworth, and at the large house party there were notable theatricals. The Bradley Martin party in Scotland, of which much has been written, still continues, and a Highland Christmas was celebrated with quaint dances and old customs were revived. Mr. and Mrs. Henry White had a small party at their country place, in which was included Mr. Winthrop Rutherfurd, Mrs. White's brother. Mrs. Ronalds and Mrs. Blow remain in London, where Mrs. Brown Potter and Mrs. Langtry are still posing as Statues of Liberty at various entertainments and Mrs. Beerbohm Tree is reciting "The Absent-Minded Beggar." The Rudyard Kiplings have made their reappearance in London, and Mr. Kipling is much improved in health.

Lily Duchess of Marlborough and Lord Beresford have had a house party at Deepdene and the Duchess of Marlborough has been at Blenheim and at Market Harboro, where her husband, now going to the wars, has a hunting lodge. The little American colony at Market Harboro is proving the life of the place. Mr. Heber Bishop stops awhile at his new home, which is near Sandringham, and then comes up to town, where he is seen entertaining his American friends and a few of his new English ones at one of the restaurants. But the upper classes are nearly all in mourning, and the death of the Duke of Westminster, who left a large family, has also affected London and English society.

***

There has been some dissatisfaction in London society concerning the theatricals and tableaux arranged by Mrs. Arthur Paget. The stalls and boxes are not only at unpopular prices, but fifteen guineas are being asked for them, and then the applicant must pass through a rigid examination of his social caste. The name of the purchaser is passed upon by a committee of dowagers, who are determined to make the affair as exclusive as possible. Royalty has consented to be on exhibition and to dine at the table d'hote or dîner de luxe which will be provided that evening at a well-known restaurant. This alone is said to be worth the price of admission. Mrs. Brown Potter will be one of those favored, and she will appear, as she is doing now at a music hall, wearing a gown of white satin trimmed with almost priceless sables, and with red roses on her corsage and in her hair. The red rose has been adopted as the battle flower of the English, and it is greatly in vogue in London.

***

With all this, one hears a great deal about Americans abroad. Everybody who has been in London during the past three weeks seems to have been dining at the restaurants. Mrs. Ronalds gave a large dinner in honor of Sir Arthur Sullivan at the Savoy, and among the guests were Mrs. Leslie and her sister, Mrs. Frewen, sisters of Lady Randolph Churchill. The last named lady seems to have been wined and dined during the last week of her stay in London and made very much of. Lady de Grey gave a large dinner at Claridge's, followed by a visit to the Palace Theatre to see the biographic scenes of the war. The Duchess of Marlborough was of the party, and she was wrapped in a sapphire velvet cloak, with sables, and had a turquois ribbon twisted in her hair. Mr. Victor Bowring entertained Prince and Princess Radziwill, and Mr. and Mrs. Cecil Powney had as guest Mrs. Douglas Grant. Among the other Christmas parties not already mentioned was a large one given by Miss Van Wart at Ditton, and another by Mrs. Forbes Leith. Lord Elphinstone and Lord Arthur Wellesley were members of this last gathering. Mr. William Waldorf Astor had also a party at Cliveden.

***

Much sympathy has been expressed for Mrs. Earle, who has many American friends. Mrs. Earle has lost her eldest son at the battle of Modder River. She is the author of that charming book "Potpourri from a Surrey Garden." She is a cousin of Lady Derby and of the Dowager Lady Ampthill.

***

The Prince and Princess Hatzfeldt have taken for a term of years Draycott Manor, the seat of Lord Cowley in Wiltshire. Prince Hatzfeldt's cousin is German Ambassador in London, and he will visit Draycott Manor as soon as his health permits. He has been very ill. Sir Bache and Lady Cunard will also be guests at the house party to be given shortly at Draycott Manor.

***

English prints are not always the kindest in the world, and the following headlines, referring to a charming American, smack a little of the middle-class British jealousy: "So she has been received at last. She must have been surprised and gratified by the unexpected honor. Charity does so much."

***

Up to this writing nothing new has been learned of the condition of Lady Alice Montagu. Mr. Fernando Yznaga is with his sister, the Duchess of Manchester, at Davos. The Duke from last accounts had just arrived in London.

Sometimes English writers have pleasant things to say of Americans. In describing Miss Lily Whitehouse, whose marriage to the Earl of Coventry's second son is to take place in January, one publication says: "She is a very vivacious American lady. She is decidedly pretty, and is always dressed in the usual smart style one associates with American women. Her father, Mr. Fitz-Hugh Whitehouse, has made himself popular in the neighborhood of Buckingham and Stony Stratford, where he has now been in residence at Thornton Hall for several Winters. Miss Lily Whitehouse hunts regularly with the Grafton and Bicester hounds. She is also musical, and sings in a pretty French style, which has rather astounded the rustics who have heard her at their country concerts."

***

Another bit of news of interest to friends in New York is that the Earl of Ava, who is at Ladysmith, is unattached, as he no longer belongs to the Seventeenth Lancers, in which he was once a Lieutenant. He has been chiefly employed at Ladysmith as a galloper, and it appears that at the battle at Elandslaagte he had no horse, and did his galloping on foot. It was thus, it is said, that he conveyed to the Gordon Highlanders, lying on the veldt under shell and rifle fire, the order to advance.

***

Lady Essex, who was Miss Adele Grant of this city, has had Mrs. Brown Potter as a guest at a house party at Cassiobury Park, Watford. Mrs. Brown Potter recited and Lady Essex gave her wonderful imitations of Yvette Guilbert and Sarah Bernhardt. Cassiobury Park is a beautiful house, and the present building was designed by Inigo Jones, although the foundations of the original manor were laid in the days of the early Bretons. The gardens were planned by the famous Le Notre. Lady Essex is much interested in collecting miniatures, and she has over 100, many of them of great historic interest and beauty.

The Riviera is yet very dull. There has been much typhoid at Nice, and the boycott by the English of the French coast has not been conducive to gayety. The American visitors have not begun to arrive. Monte Carlo is still very dull. Pau has a very good opera, which seems to share the attention of the foxhunting people and golfers. The season in the Engadine begins only next month. Cairo is also dull for the present. Judge and Mrs. Batcheller have arrived from Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Turnure will entertain this Winter, and will have as guests for a time Mr. and Mrs. Duncan Cameron.

Gen. and Mrs. Draper have arrived at Rome. They are to be present at one of the State balls at the Quirinal. Mr. and Mrs. Osgood Field, who have been both ill, are now improving. They are with their daughter, the Princess Branccaccio.

***

Paris is not a very agreeable place on the Jour de l'An. Society, as a rule, flees from town and goes into the country. The holiday weeks, however, have been gay, after a fashion. The Comte and Comtesse de Castellane have been entertaining a great deal, and there have been the usual musicales and a gay crowd at Ritz's and the Palais d'Hiver. Mr. "Plus" More and Mrs. George Law, having returned, are arranging for their Winter season on the Riviera.

Christmas week in Philadelphia has brought a series of festivities which rarely come at this time of year. The week began with a large theatre party, followed by a supper given by Mrs. Henry Williams Biddle in honor of her niece, Miss Edith Biddle. The four state boxes were taken, and nearly all the débutantes of the season were present. On the same evening dinners were given by Mr. and Mrs. William Masters Camac and Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Stevenson.

***

The last of the series of musicales was given on Thursday afternoon by Mr. Edmund D. Lewis at his residence, in Philadelphia. It was a brilliant affair, and his beautiful residence was crowded with a large assemblage of guests. Mrs. John Easby, in a handsome gown of pale gray, trimmed with purple chiffon and pearl ornaments, together with Mrs. Cornelius Stevenson, in black satin and white lace, received the guests. Mrs. Frederic Thurston Mason, in pale gray, embroidered in pink, and Mrs. Clifford Lewis, in black satin, presided at the tea table. The musical part of the programme was admirably carried out under the direction of Mr. S. Tudor Strang, who played the accompaniment for Miss Alva Jones and Mr. Fitzgerald.

***

The wedding of Mr. Harry Eising and Miss Lowenthal will be celebrated at Delmonico's to-morrow, New Year's Day.

Mrs. James Wilson Clark and Miss Clark of 46 East Fifty-third Street will give two receptions on Thursdays, Jan. 4 and 11, and will be at home informally on Tuesdays until Lent, as usual.

***

On Thursday evening after the opera in Philadelphia Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Alexander Reilly gave an elaborate supper at the Bellevue in honor of the Austrian Minister and his wife, the Baroness Hengelmuller. Mrs. Reilly's guests occupied three tables, which were beautifully decorated with white flowers. Her guests included Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Dana, Judge and Mrs. McMichael, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Voorhees, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Whelen, Mr. Hazlehurst, the Hon. Miss Audrey Pauncefote, daughter of Lord Pauncefote; Miss Snyder, Mr. Spencer Easby, and Mr. J. Ridgway Reilly. The menu was printed on hand-painted cards, with the name of each guest on it.

***

Mr. William Ashhurst gave a supper at the Bellevue, Philadelphia, after the opera on Thursday, which was chaperoned by his mother, Mrs. Henry Ashhurst. His guests included Miss Marion Pepper, Miss Violet Whelen, Miss Alice Welsh, Miss Christine Penrose, Miss Edith Taylor, Miss Elsie Miller, Mr. Meade Large, Mr. and Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Ladner Reakirt, Mr. William Muncy Forbes, Mr. J. Lardner Howell, and Mr. Charles Sidenberg. Mrs. Henry Brinton Coxe, Jr., gave a tea at her Philadelphia residence on Thursday afternoon for the Hon. Miss Audrey Pauncefote, the daughter of the British Ambassador at Washington. Miss Minnie Drexel Fell, who is to marry Mr. Robert Kelso Cassatt on Jan. 22, will have as her bridesmaids Miss Ellen Drexel Paul, Miss Hutchinson, Miss Elsie Cassatt, Miss Katherine Cassat, Miss Rhoda Howe, and Miss Gray of New York. Mr. Cassatt will give a dinner to his ushers on Jan. 20. They will be Mr. Thomas Ridgway, Mr. George L. Harrison, Jr., Mr. Charles R. Wood, Mr. Samuel Reeves, Mr. George McFadden, Mr. Francis W. Rawle, Mr. Livingston Biddle, Mr. R. T. W. Moss, and Mr. Sidney Lawton. Mr. Murray Forbes will act as best man. Mr. and Mrs. Daniel S. B. Chew gave an elaborate dinner Wednesday evening in Philadelphia, followed by a box party.

***

Last evening Mr. John Mohr gave a dinner at the Flanders, Philadelphia, in honor of a number of New Yorkers, who went over for that event. The floral decorations were of an elaborate nature, and Mr. Mohr's guests included Mr. J. Searle Barclay, Mr. Scott Cameron, Mr. Munson Morris, Mr. Woodward Babcock, Mr. Bradish Johnson, and Mr. Trowbridge Martin. Mr. George W. C. Drexel also gave last evening a supper for men.

SOCIETY NOTES.

Mrs. John P. Kane of 118 West Seventy-ninth Street has issued cards for a coming out reception at her residence on Jan. 6 for her daughter, Miss Agatha E. Kane.

Mr. J. B. Colgan of West Fifty-seventh Street gave a very elaborate dinner Christmas Day to Mrs. F. B. Hall, Mr. O. B. Joly, and a few others of Boston, who left on the Cunarder yesterday for Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. F. F. Lowenfels will entertain a number of their friends this New Year's Eve at their residence, 31 West Seventieth Street. Invitations for this affair have been out for some time.

On Wednesday evening Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Mayer of 59 East Seventy-seventh Street gave a dinner of about 100 covers at Sherry's. As the dinner was in honor of their silver wedding, the decorations were in white and silver.

William H. Porter, Haydon H. Butts, Paul Coster, A. B. Bristow, B. W. Keeting, Hulbert, and Ward. The dance was under the direction of the following young women: Miss Mabel Georgina Constantine, Miss Ray Maude Keeting, and Miss Alice Benedict Bristow, assisted by the following Floor Committee: Messrs. TWENTY-SIX PAGES.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

To-morrow we enter upon the last year of a century that is marked by greater progress in all that pertains to the material well-being and enlightenment of mankind than all the previous history of the race; and the political, social, and moral advancement has been hardly less striking.

The century opened with all Europe in a state of war, and after the delusive and short-lived peace of Amiens, (1802,) NAPOLEON as First Consul and then as Emperor of France was for thirteen years in almost continual conflict with the great powers. The lesser nations—Spain, Italy, Holland, Belgium, Norway, and Sweden, and some of the German States were submissive under rulers of his choosing, but most of the time Austria, Prussia, Russia, and England were combined against him. His design of invading England was frustrated by the "sea power" and NELSON'S victory at Trafalgar in 1805, but on land he seemed invincible until 1812, when he undertook his ill-fated expedition to Moscow, and the English expelled his forces from Spain. Then the tide turned. Through the varying fortunes of the capture of Paris, the retirement to Elba, and the "hundred days," he came to Waterloo in 1815, and spent the remnant of his days until 1821 at St. Helena. The fierce conflict between England and France disturbed the peace of the United States, for it was their interference with trade by NAPOLEON'S Berlin decrees and the English orders in Council, that produced suffering and discontent in this country, and occasioned England's exercise of the right of search, which brought on the war of 1812. In that contest we had some triumphs on the sea and only misfortunes on the land until JACKSON'S victory at New Orleans made both parties ready to end a war for which neither had much relish.

After the Napoleonic disturbances of boundaries in Europe the Congress of Vienna, in which Russia, Austria, Prussia, and England had the prevailing voice, undertook to reconstruct the nations nearly upon their old lines and to restore the ancient forms and methods of government. The Holy Roman Empire was gone, and Austria now headed a German confederation; Italy was again dismembered, and the Bourbon monarchs returned to the thrones of France and Spain. Austria, Prussia, and Russia formed the Holy Alliance for the maintenance of the peace of Europe and the preservation of existing dynasties. But the subject peoples, who had borne the cost and suffering of twenty-five years of conflict were no longer submissive to the old order of things. The lessons of American independence, the French Revolution, and NAPOLEON'S subversion of ancient traditions were bearing fruit, and a struggle began for constitutional liberty and representative government. An incidental effect of this, even while the nations of Europe were at war, was the revolt of the American colonies of the weakest of the powers, and between 1810 and 1821 the dependencies of Spain, beginning with Buenos Ayres and ending with Mexico, became independent. In 1822 Brazil broke away from Portugal and became an empire. The disposition of the Holy Alliance to intervene and bring these new-born States to their old allegiance was checked by the proclamation of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823, in which the United States was assured of the sympathy and countenance of Great Britain. While engaged in his aggressive warfare in Europe NAPOLEON had sold the vast territory of Louisiana to the United States in 1803, and in 1821 Spain gave up Florida. The first effort to rise against oppression in Europe was made in Greece in 1821, and after a seven years' struggle England and France came to her rescue and in the naval battle of Navarino broke the Turkish power and set Hellas free. Its independence was acknowledged by the Sultan in 1829. There had also been risings in Italy, but Austria supressed them, as the chief power in the Holy Alliance.

The history of Great Britain from Waterloo to the middle of the century was made up chiefly of contests of the people for Constitutional and parliamentary reforms. They had had practically no voice in their Government before. Two-thirds of the members of the House of Commons were chosen by the peers and rich landowners, and spoils and corruption prevailed in the public service. There was no public education, criminal and poor laws were grossly inequitable, prisons were outrageously managed, taxation was oppressive, and labor was in a state of misery. Bold and persistent agitation under able leaders extorted remedial measures from Parliament and resulted in 1832 in the first substantial representation of the people in the House of Commons. The extension of the suffrage gave a new impetus to improvement in legislation and administration, and the Chartist agitation made new demands even after the accession of VICTORIA in 1837 and the fresh impulse which that event gave to the sentiment of loyalty. The contest for the repeal of the oppressive corn laws and the establishment of free trade culminated in 1846. Meantime England had made great strides in industrial and commercial progress, while the social and moral condition of the people advanced with their gain in political power. The results were fittingly celebrated in the first World's Fair in London in 1851.

The French people, wearied and exhausted by the tremendous drain of NAPOLEON'S costly conquests, fell under the reactionary and oppressive rule of the Bourbons and bore the burden with increasing discontent until 1830, when they had gained enough strength and spirit to rise in revolt and drive CHARLES X. from the throne. They won a Constitutional government, and LOUIS PHILIPPE courted their favor for a time, while they gained a new sense of popular power. But the Government was extravagant and costly and tended to revert to arbitrary ways. The popular mind turned back to the glories of the empire, and when NAPOLEON'S remains were brought to Paris in 1840 there were demonstrations that boded ill for the bourgeois monarchy. Already LOUIS NAPOLEON had made his first attempt to provoke an insurrection, and a few years later a second one sent him to prison. The agitation for a larger measure of popular rights went on under such leaders as ARAGO, LAMARTINE, THIERS, and the King grew more unpopular, until he was forced to abdicate in 1848, when the shrewd, persistent, and unscrupulous LOUIS NAPOLEON found his opportunity and contrived to be elected President of the newly founded republic. He strengthened his power on the nominal basis of universal suffrage, gaining control of the police and the army, until in 1851 he was able to overthrow a hostile Assembly and soon after to set up an empire, with a new Constitution of his own making. He was crowned as Emperor in December, 1852.

Germany continued to be a loose confederation of more than thirty States, with a growing rivalry between the Kingdom of Prussia and the Empire of Austria for the ascendancy, and a growing struggle of the people for Constitutional privileges. The policy of suppression led to violent outbreaks in 1848, the year of revolution in Paris. Concessions were made in Prussia, but after an attempt to form a new German Empire had failed in 1849, there was a reversion to the policy of repression and a strengthening of the throne and the army to resist popular encroachment upon royal power. In Austria the revolt led to the declaration of the independence of Hungary under the lead of LOUIS KOSSUTH, first President of the Hungarian Republic in 1849, but Russia intervened to help the Emperor crush out the movement for self-government. Italy had continued to consist of the kingdoms of Sardinia, Naples, and Sicily, and several duchies and principalities, while the Pope ruled at Rome, and Lombardy and Venice were appurtenances of Austria. But the ardor of MAZZINI and the genius of CAVOUR were preparing the way for a united Italy. In 1848 there was an insurrection in Naples which was put down by the King, FERDINAND II., and Sardinia tried to force Austria out of Lombardy, but without avail. For a time the popular movements were compelled to subside. The northern nations were comparatively quiescent during the first half of the century, though Russia was extending her borders both in Europe and Asia. Turkey not only lost Greece in 1829, but ten years later her power over Egypt was broken; otherwise her corrupt and oppressive rule was maintained to the middle of the century. Away from home Britain's empire had been growing. Canada progressed peaceably toward colonial freedom; Australia, which was a heritage from Capt. COOK'S discoveries, was passing from a region of exploration and a penal colony to a domain of flourishing dependencies; the English foothold in South Africa was a mere vantage ground for the future, and the Indian Empire, which had its beginning before the century opened in a possession exploited by a commercial company, was enlarged by the suppression of native revolts and the annexation of troublesome States. India was a dependency under military government until after the middle of the century. English traders had broken into China before 1840 and their protection led to what is known as the opium war and to the possession of Hongkong, but Japan was not opened to the world's trade until after the expedition of Commodore PERRY in 1853.

The third quarter of the century was characterized by new wars, which brought political changes and adjustments that could have been effected by no other means. The Crimean war of 1854-5 grew out of the demand of the Emperor of France for certain privileges for Latin Christians in Palestine, the interference of the Emperor NICHOLAS in behalf of the Greek Church, and his claim to a protectorate over the Christian population of Turkey. England joined France on the side of Turkey and Sardinia came in, hoping for advantage for Italy in such an alliance. Russia's advance to the Mediterranean was stopped and Turkey was saved to maintain the "balance of power" in Europe. Having France as an ally, Sardinia fought Austria in 1859, and after the battles of Magenta and Solferino gained Lombardy, while France took Savoy and Nice. Austria and Prussia quarreled over Schleswig and Holstein, which they had torn from Denmark, and came to blows in 1866, when the first breech-loading needle gun settled the battle of Sadowa and Austria's pretensions as head of the German system were ended, and the North German Confederation was formed. CAVOUR, with the help of GARIBALDI in Sicily and Naples, had been striving for united Italy; the opportunity of the war of Austria with Prussia was seized, and after Sadowa the Italian nation was formed under VICTOR EMMANUEL, with the capital at Florence. Four years later, when the French bayonets no longer held up the temporal power of the Pope, the Papal States fell into the union and Rome became the capital and Italy was a European power. In 1867 the Empire of Austria-Hungary was formed.

In 1870 NAPOLEON III., needing distractions to avert opposition to his corrupt and decaying power, provoked the war with Germany, which created the German Empire and the Third French Republic. Other wars in the last half of the century have been waged mainly to force civilization forward. The revolt of Christian provinces against the cruel oppression of Turkey brought on the conflict between Russia and that nation in 1877, when, after the fall of Plevna, Roumelia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro were freed from their vassal state, Servia having been enfranchised long before. England's contests in India and with the fierce peoples beyond its northern borders had their serious episodes, the chief of which was the mutiny of the Sepoy soldiers in 1857, when the greased cartridges of the Enfield rifle roused their superstitious frenzy. After the fierce battles by which the consequent insurrections were quelled, the Government of India was for the first time placed under the British Crown direct.

The history of the United States since the early years of the century has consisted mainly of territorial expansion, industrial and commercial development, and the settlement by political agitation and the conflict of arms of the problems entailed upon the Republic by the heritage of slavery. England prohibited the slave trade in 1807, and the United States followed the example, but when the former nation decreed emancipation for slaves with compensation to the owners in 1833, the "institution" had become too firmly wrought into our industrial and political fabric to be easily dislodged. The anti-slavery agitation began in earnest with the starting of GARRISON'S "Liberator" in 1831, but the wide cultivation of cotton in the South, the invention of the "gin," the development of the manufactures of cotton in the North, and the demand for the material in England, made the perpetuation of slavery seem an economic necessity and gave a fanatical zeal to its defenders. The annexation of Texas, which had become independent of Mexico in 1836, brought on the Mexican war of 1845, which incidentally increased the slave power. Upon the close of that war, in 1848, the Free Soil Party was formed, and the adoption of the fugitive slave law in 1850 gave a new intensity to the controversy. The publication of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in 1852 added fuel to the flames, and the repeal of the Missouri Compromise in 1854 made the conflict irrepressible. Then the Republican Party was formed and the country was politically divided on the slavery question. When LINCOLN was elected President, in 1860, and the ordinances of secession were adopted, the passions of the people were wrought to such a pitch that only war and the destruction of slavery could save the Union. When the Republic had passed through that fiery ordeal her face was set in a new direction. The Nation was reconstructed with new guarantees of freedom and equal rights, and with new difficulties to overcome. They are not all surmounted yet, but the movement has been steadily forward.

In Europe political advancement has continued. England began the reform of her civil service in 1855, and made new extensions of parliamentary franchise in 1867 and again in 1884. Before the last "reform" act, provision had been made for the secret ballot and for the punishment of corrupt practices at elections. Notable reforms have been wrought out in the government of cities, and legislation affecting the welfare of the citizen has constantly improved. In spite of drawbacks and turmoils, the French Republic has grown in strength and stability; Germany is constantly forced toward a recognition of the power of public opinion and the dependence of Government upon popular support, and even Russia is not wholly impervious to the enlightening sentiment of the world. While armaments and defenses have been increased, they have become avowedly a means of preserving peace by deterring from war, and the tendency toward a settlement of international disputes by arbitration resulted in a conference at The Hague a few months ago, in which all the great powers were represented at the invitation of the Czar of Russia. Small as the practical result seemed to be, it is a promising sign for the new century.

But what characterizes the nineteenth century more than all else is the vast strides in scientific discovery and the application of the forces of nature to the service of man. The wave theory of light, the nebular hypothesis, and the discovery of spectrum analysis have made new revelations in the heavens and exalted our conceptions of time and space. The atomic theory in chemistry, the molecular composition of gas, and the doctrine of the conservation of energy have opened a new avenue to the understanding of the earth. The cell theory of organisms, LAMARCK'S discoveries as to the progressive development of plants and animals, DARWIN'S study of the origin of species, the doctrine of evolution, and the tracing of the globe's history in the geological strata, relegate all the sciences that preceded this century to the same category as the lore of the Chaldaeans and the Egyptians. Knowledge of the human frame and its functions and the treatment of its defects and maladies have developed from the rudest germs in this century. The use of anaesthetics and antiseptics, improved surgical methods and appliances, and scientific sanitation and hygiene have prolonged life and added to its comforts. But when we think of the mechanical inventions, the applications of machinery to the saving of human labor and the multiplying of its product, the marvel grows.

Friction matches did not exist until 1827. Torches, candles, rushlights, and rude oil lamps were not superseded by the argand burner until 1830, and petroleum and gas as illuminants are still later. The steam engine and the power loom were invented in the last century, but they were primitive devices, and all the vast and complicated machinery of manufacture which so enormously increases man's power of production and of interchange of products has been created since the Napoleonic wars. The first experimental steamboat was launched in 1807, but it was 1838 before successful steam navigation on the ocean began. The first rude railway from Darlington to Stockton, in England, was opened in 1825, what time the Erie Canal brought the Great Lakes into communication with the ocean, and the first section of the Baltimore and Ohio was completed in 1828. The modern locomotive and railroad train and the vast system of transportation that reticulates the face of the earth have had their colossal growth within the lifetime of men still surviving. Electricity excited wonder and fear, but performed no service for men before FARADAY'S discovery of the means of developing it by magnetism, in 1831. It was first used for signaling on railroads in 1837, and it was in 1844 that the first telegraphic message was sent from Baltimore to Washington. A submarine cable was stretched from Dover to Calais in 1851, and the first Atlantic cable was laid in 1858, though the first to work successfully was that of 1866. The first exhibition of the telephone was ten years later. Electric lighting is not a quarter of a century old, and the application of the subtle fluid as a heating and propelling power is still in its infancy. DAGUERRE'S first discovery of picture making by the sun's rays was made in 1839, and the printing of photographs from negatives dates from 1850. The development of cheap and profuse illustration since has been attended by marvelous improvements in all that pertains to printing and the diffusion of intelligence.

Attending the wonderful advance in the use of labor-saving and product-multiplying machinery and in the means of transportation and interchange, has been the growth of corporations, by which the productive power of capital has been massed, and the development of a vast system of credit and banking whereby 95 per cent. of the exchanges is effected without the use of money, although the volume of currency in use has enormously increased. The creation of wealth during the present century has been prodigious and goes on with accelerating pace, and in spite of complaints of unfair distribution, its benefits are irresistibly diffused, so that the condition of the mass of the people is immensely improved and continually improving. There is much to do, but the forces that enlighten and elevate humanity have gained tremendous power in the century and are dispelling ignorance, degradation, and misery as never before.

We step upon the threshold of 1900, which leads to the new century, facing a still brighter dawn for human civilization. Through agitation and conflict European nations are working toward an ultimate harmony of interests and purposes, and bringing awakened Asia into the sweeping current of progress. Light has been let into the "Dark Continent" beyond the ancient borders and is rapidly spreading. America is facing westward and beginning to take its part in carrying the regenerating forces of popular government to the uttermost parts of the earth. Notwithstanding the bloody conflicts through which some of the steps of progress must still be made, the "vision of the world" grows clearer toward the time when—

> The war-drum throbbed no longer, and the battle-flags were furled
> There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
> And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

THE RELIGION OF THE BOERS.

The witnesses agree that the piety of the Boer is one of his most conspicuous traits. They do not agree as to the nature of the religious sentiment that inspires him. The Puritan humbled himself before his GOD, but set his foot upon the neck of the King. The Boer likes to treat Kings in that way. But is he meek and lowly in his religious moments?

> In general, the Boers are characterized by a pronounced traditional piety of the Reformed type. It is chiefly nourished by the study of the Old Testament, especially of the historical books, and loves to employ and imitate Old Testament examples and pictures. In a genuine Boer family the Bible lies upon the centre table, and every day is opened and closed with family prayer. A collection of sermons is taken along when on a journey, and public services are attended regularly, even if at great sacrifice and trouble. The Boer regards himself as specially honored if the dominie, for whom he has great respect, visits his house. Then the neighbors are called in and public services are held.

From another witness, Mr. GEORGE LACY, who contributes to The North American Review some results of a close study of Boer character, we take the following estimate:

> The Boer I take to be a Deist more than a Christian. His Predikant in the churches may hold forth to him the Christian doctrines, but away from them his GOD is an anthropomorphic GOD. He is in the first place the GOD of War, and in the second, GOD the Protector. The belief that the first and most acceptable, if not the only, business GOD has is to look after the interests of the Boer, I take to be absolutely sincere. Whether these fanatical persuasions can rightly be called beliefs is a question into which I cannot enter, beyond stating my own conviction that they are more hysterical in their nature than grounded on thought or reason. Hysterical or not, the Boer acts up to his belief. His GOD teaches him neither ethics nor morals; He is GOD the Warrior and GOD the Protector, and nothing more. He is the GOD of the Pentateuch, and therefore the Boer ethic is the ethic of the Jews in the Wilderness, supplemented by additions resulting from his peculiar life in the midst of wild animals and wilder men. How far his fanatical belief that he is GOD'S special favorite enters into his life, apart from making him arrogant, is not easy to determine. He is regular in his observances of the forms of worship which his circumstances have created for him; but except in times of peril the influence of his religious belief is not otherwise traceable. His method of worship is lugubrious in the extreme. To the eye there is neither reverence, cheerfulness, nor devotion in it. It is a thing of the life, and full of dolefulness and gloom. It is like a nightmare. The solemnity is so stolid, the tone so monotonous, sing-song, and gruesome, and the whole function so lifeless and soulless, that it is impossible to believe that there is any real feeling in it.

We should judge from the testimony of both these observers that the imagination played about as prominent a part as the contrite heart in the religious manifestations of this interesting people. It may be doubted whether the ethical teachings of the Old Testament would sink very deep into their minds or greatly influence their daily lives if their interest were not awakened by the imagined likeness of their own condition to that of the peoples of the Bible.

OUR TREATY-MAKING POWER.

Mr. HENRY LOOMIS NELSON contributes to the current number of Harper's Weekly an interesting and suggestive article upon the peculiar situation in which we are put by the partition of the treaty-making power between the President and the Senate. His text is the alleged tripartite understanding which has been alleged chiefly, if not exclusively, by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN to exist between Great Britain, Germany, and the United States. It will be remembered that the President's message appeared just after the report of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S speech at Leicester, in which the allegation was made. The message contained a reaffirmation of our old fear of "entangling alliances," and this reaffirmation was construed in British circles hostile to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN as a direct "snub" to that statesman. Very likely that was not the true explanation. Whether it was or not, Mr. NELSON'S paper is directed to showing that the power of the Senate, by being admitted to participate in treaties, is so great over the foreign policy of the country that it is much safer for whoever has dealings with us to trust to an "understanding" than to a treaty.

Even in the case of an understanding, which is a measure of policy for any acts done in accordance with which the Executive is responsible to the country at large, it is always to be understood, as part of the "understanding," that the whole arrangement is liable to be upset by the action of Congress. That is equally true of the action of the British Foreign Office, which is always reviewable by Parliament, and its authors liable to be put out of office if the nation disapproves what they have done. Only there is an immense difference between asking the nation what it thinks of what you have done after you have done it and asking it while your negotiations are still incomplete. As a matter of fact, many treaties which have failed would have succeeded but for our practice of asking the Senate about them beforehand, and would have increased the popularity of the Administration which negotiated them. Such, for example, was the arbitration treaty, which died, like CAESAR, on the floor of the Senate. Mr. NELSON reports a conversation in which Secretary HAY, not then Secretary, took part in the smoking room of an Atlantic steamer, and in which one of the talkers predicted, apparently without dissent from the others, that the Senate would never again ratify an important treaty.

The origin of the participation of the Senate in executive functions is not impressive. That is one of the features of our Constitution which we did not borrow from the British Constitution, but from the old Provincial Councils of which the purpose was to give a British Viceroy such local information and advice as to prevent him from making grievous mistakes about the character of his appointments. There never was any reason why this power of "advice and consent" should be extended to treaty making, and there is less now than ever before, seeing that we have become much more closely involved with international affairs. It would, we think, be impossible to cite a case in which the participation of the Senate in the treaty-making power has done any good, while a short memory can recall instances in which it has done mischief. It is true that, in spite of our quadrennial changes of Administration, we have managed to have a foreign policy sufficiently stable and continuous to command the respect of mankind. But the Senate has had nothing whatever to do with that. If we inquire, we shall find that the continuity of our foreign policy has proceeded exclusively from the continuity of the traditions of the State Department. In one sense, the question raised by Mr. NELSON may be dismissed as academic; but we shall be lucky if we do not find it extremely practical.

APPRAISER WAKEMAN AGAIN.

The ideal of the protectionist in office is that of benevolent despotism, and human nature is so constituted that in this combination the despotism steadily tends to crowd out the benevolence. Appraiser WILBUR F. WAKEMAN undoubtedly is firmly convinced that it would be for the best interest of all the American people that the duties on imported goods shall be made in accordance with the theories of the American Protective League, of which he is a zealous officer. As Appraiser, with a voice in the interpretation of the law fixing the duties, he found faith in the protectionist theory constantly induces him to assert and apply that theory wherever there is a loophole in the law that permits him to do so. He regards the importers who resist this policy as selfish and prejudiced persons whose views are not to be considered in contradiction to his own purely abstract and quasi-religious convictions. The result is that he and the importers do not get on well together.

We are sorry, but we fear that the difference is irreconcilable. Mr. WAKEMAN is, as KINGLAKE said of Mr. GLADSTONE, "in the worst sense of the word a good man." He not only has a fanatical assurance that he is right in his dispute with the importers, but he has power to act. The importers are reduced to protests and to appeals to Washington, where naturally the presumption is in favor of the Appraiser. The Merchants' Union, one of the most intelligent and honorable organizations of business men this city has ever seen, has, through a thoroughly impartial committee, with representatives on it from Chicago, investigated Mr. WAKEMAN carefully, and the conclusion is reached that he ought to be relieved of his duties. In that conclusion we confess that we agree. We admit Mr. WAKEMAN'S modest claim that he is "honest." We know nothing to the contrary, though we could not imagine an entirely honest man without the bacillus of protectionism in his brain pursuing the course that he pursues. But honesty of the type of his is not, after all, so rare that all other qualities must be sacrificed to retain it. There are at least a million men in the city who are as honest as Mr. WAKEMAN, and of these there must be several thousand who are capable of doing his work quite as well and hundreds who can do it better than he. Mr. GAGE cannot be said to be shut up to him alone.

"Other times, other ways." The Administration should realize that we have outgrown the period of Wakemans in the public service. He is antiquated. He belongs to the era of what we may call without disrespect the undeveloped McKinley, he of the House of Representatives and the Ways and Means Committee. He is not in harmony with the President of to-day and his expansive and progressive policy. His mental development, unlike that of the President, has been arrested. He can neither forget nor learn. His mole eyes are fixed on a past that, though apparently recent, is in reality as distant and irrevocable as the day of the stage coach and the canal packet. The President would do well to get rid of him. Let him have all his time to devote to the service of his beloved and antediluvian Protective League.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

—A paragraph in The Chicago Chronicle not only supports our belief that for a good many people the news of the landslide at Amalfi brought the first convincing proof of that picturesque town's practicability as a place of human residence, but it goes further and shows that in Chicago at least there are numerous individuals to whom the name of the little city, even when seen on a drop curtain, did not convey any impression whatever. The Chronicle gravely says: "Theatregoers who attend the Alhambra Theatre have wondered often what the meaning of the word 'Amalfi,' which is painted on the drop curtain, is. Recent cablegrams printed in the morning papers solved the problem. The word is the name of a village situated at the foot of a mountain in Italy." That is truly delightful. Of course, the mere fact that this or that fragment of European history or geography comes with all the force of novelty to a Chicago paper proves nothing, or, at least, not much, as to the amount of general information possessed by the average Chicagoan. It only shows that there are in that city social circles of considerable diameter where knowledge has limitations curiously different from those which exist elsewhere.

—With the charitable purpose of presenting a psychological explanation for the inaccuracy which all too often marks the work of perfectly honest reporters, The Christian Register says: "When one is listening to a discourse two things occupy his mind at the same time; the one, the discourse to which he is listening; the other, the train of thought suggested to him by the discourse. The second runs along in his mind parallel with the first, and frequently is remembered and reported in place of the discourse, which is forgotten." There is something, perhaps a good deal, in this theory, but however well it may serve as an explanation, its utility as an excuse is of the smallest. The simplest way out of the difficulty is to lay all the blame on Dame Nature, whose hostility to exact duplications of any kind is illustrated in every inch of her broad domain. No two men ever heard or saw a thing alike, and probably no two ever will. Reporters are no more fallible than other people; indeed, their accuracy is far above the average. They, however, have a thousand critics where other folks have one, and not one of the thousand ever passes over their errors of apprehension or expression in kindly silence.

—This is a late day for such secrecy as was attempted by the Navy Department with respect to the Montgomery's cruise along the African coast. With mails going everywhere, and cables covering the earth with reticulations approaching the minute, nothing of any importance can be long hidden from the public eye, and any efforts to veil the movements of a body so large and interesting as a warship are doomed to failure. And the would-be worker in darkness is lucky if the failure is not so speedy as to be a little ridiculous. At best he is sure to create curiosity even stronger than the intrinsic importance of his secret deserves, and then ingenious theorizers by the hundred will make one supposition after another so rapidly that the right one is sure to be but within a day or two. Whatever faults there may be in the "new diplomacy," the old variety is hopelessly out of date, and Secretary LONG should not try to revive it.

—Rumors have come from time to time that the High Priestess of "Christian Science" was dead, and that for business reasons the demise had been concealed from the rank and file of dupes. We never paid much attention to these yarns, as they were obviously too melodramatic to be credible, and now we know that there is nothing in them. Mrs. MARY &c. EDDY is still very thoroughly alive, with all her faculties from small abilities in good working order. This is proved beyond question by a communication which appears in The Christian Science Sentinel of Dec. 21—proved, not because the communication bears the High Priestess's name as signature, but because nobody else on earth except herself could or would have written in just this strain. It is addressed to "Beloved," meaning, doubtless, all who buy the Eddy book, and runs as follows: "I ask this favor of all Christian Scientists: Do not send to me on, before, or after the forthcoming holidays aught material, except three tea jackets—all may contribute to these. One learns to value material things only as one needs them, and the costliest things are those that one needs least. Among my present needs material are these jackets. Two, of darkish, heavy silk, the shade appropriate to white hair. The third, of thick satin, lighter shade, but sufficiently sombre. Nos. 1 and 2 to be common-sense jackets for mother to work in, and not overtrimmed by any means. No. 3 for best, such as she can afford for her drawing room." That's no forgery; it's the genuine thing, and Mrs. EDDY is certainly still in the flesh.

—In Western Kansas there is a place—whether city, town, or village we are regretfully ignorant—a place named Great Bend, and in Great Bend there is published a paper called The Great Bend Tribune, and in The Great Bend Tribune there recently appeared a brief essay of an intensely interesting and truly remarkable nature—an essay that will, we are sure, give full as much pleasure and instruction to our own readers as it undoubtedly did to those of our estimable contemporary. This serenest of literary gems is signed by several names, which, we do not hesitate to assume, belong to the leaders of Great Bend society, for the owners of them had been intrusted with the management of a brilliant function in which the youth and beauty, the wealth and learning, of Great Bend had gladly participated. After a few congratulatory remarks about the success of their efforts to please, the managers turn to a graver topic and say: "One of the young ladies who attended the box supper at the Woodmen Hall acted very unladylike in refusing to eat with the young gentleman who purchased her box, by leaving the room just after her box was sold. She staid out until supper was over, when she returned and participated in the dance. Not satisfied with what she had done, every time while dancing she would call the attention of her partner, also others, to the box and young man, and together they would laugh and make great sport over it. If a young lady comes to a box supper and brings a box, she should abide by the result and eat with the person purchasing it. If she can't abide by the result, the best place for her is at home under her mother's protection." We don't understand quite all of this, but we like every bit of it.

—We learn from a proclamation which all the daily papers of Denver have just addressed to a deeply interested world that said papers "are the equals of those of Chicago, St. Louis, and other great Eastern cities, in size and enterprise." It is furthest from our intention to deny, or even to question, the truth of this assertion. It lacks, to be sure, some of the qualities that have made the violet a floral favorite, but modesty is not the only good thing on earth, and it is an undoubted fact that if the Denver dailies leave to others the sounding of their bugle notes, the awakening of the echoes in that particular way may be inconveniently delayed. What impresses us most in the declaration is its intimation as to where, in Denver's opinion, that ever-changing region, "the East," is at present situated. The Denver papers, it seems, look for the Eastern standards of size and enterprise in Chicago and St. Louis, not in Philadelphia, Boston, or New York. It is a pity that they did not tell what cities are suggested to them by the word "West." The omission leaves us in doubt whether, for them, the sun sets over San Francisco, Manila, Constantinople, or London.

MAKING CLOTHES FIRE-PROOF.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

During the last year deaths caused by clothes or curtains catching fire have been of frequent occurrence. The announcements of such deaths in the various papers are usually accompanied by very touching accounts of the grief of near relatives—if there are any—of the victims. Yet, when Prof. Robert Ogden Doremus of the College of the City of New York offers a most valuable suggestion for preventing almost all deaths, such as caused in the above-mentioned manner, it remains unheeded by many, who, I am sure, have directly or indirectly received it. Prof. Doremus recommended that phosphate of ammonia be used to treat all wearing apparel and all such furniture as it is possible to treat with it.

In the case of curtains and other starched goods, the phosphate of ammonia should be mixed with the starch after the ordinary washing had been gone through with. Phosphate of ammonia will not in the least harm clothes treated with it. Everything which common sense so dictates can be treated with this chemical. Its use makes groundless all anxiety, fears of danger, and worse than all, death from causes aforementioned.

I earnestly seek and am almost sure to enlist the aid of your estimable paper, THE NEW YORK TIMES, in securing the adoption of this preventive of deaths, not only in households, but also on the stage and wherever danger from the sources already mentioned is to be apprehended.

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

From The Living Church.

The night is starry, bright, and clear,
With moonlight glimmering on the snow;
And midnight winds, with voices low,
Sing dirges for the dying year.

Old Year—I pray we part as friends!
Sincerely we can say "Adieu!"
And as we welcome in the New
We promise him to make amends—

We pledge ourselves to nobler deeds,
To loftier thought and purer life,
To be more faithful in the strife
For what our nobler nature pleads.

Remembering all the solemn past,
Its lessons treasured in the heart,
So we will live and act our part
As if this New Year were our last.

Our Chance of Lasting Prosperity.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES by

By AMOS K. FISKE.

EVERY financial crisis and the consequences which is brings have their peculiar characteristics and convey their special lesson, and a glance at the causes of the depression through which we passed from 1893 to 1897, and at the process of recovery, is necessary to a clear view of the prospect before us. The two years prior to 1890 were characterized by extraordinary speculations in Europe. It was the period of the failure of the Panama Canal project, which had absorbed a vast valume of the savings of the French people, and of the collapse of the great copper syndicate and the suspension of the Comptoir d'Escompte, which disturbed the financial institutions of France. It was a time when accumulated British capital was hunting for investment, exploiting schemes in South Africa and South America and forming syndicates to acquire profitable properties in the United States, and when bold ventures were made in the credit of half-developed countries.

Heavy losts of Argentine securities were floated in London, and one of the historic banking concerns of the metropolis allowed itself to be overwhelmed with them. The suspension of the house of Baring Brothers & Co. in 1890 produced a crisis in the British capital that sent a shock throughout the commercial world the effect of which was destined to linger until reinforced by other disturbances in the financial elements.

Another direful event of the year 1890 was the passage by our Congress of the fatuous silver purchase act, which more than any other thing proved to be the curse of our woes in this closing decade of the century. It did not stay the depreciation of the pallid metal, but it set the current of gold flowing out of the country, just as Europe was eager to gather it in. For the next two years the forces were gathering for a crisis. Austria was preparing for gold payments and Russia was accumulating the precious metal; and we let them drain our coffers, which we filled with silver, while a stream of paper issued forth. Monetary conferences availed us not; and toward the end of 1892, when our rather deficient crops met with unusually abundant products abroad, when railroad traffic grew stagnant and manufactures began to languish, credit was violently shaken and a tremor ran through the whole industrial and financial fabric of the land.

When the new Administration came into power in 1893 the process of buying silver and issuing Treasury notes was going on relentlessly, and gold was stealing away unchecked to countries where it was more highly appreciated. There was a creeping dread that a suspension of redemption in gold would be forced and our currency would be precipitated to a silver basis, hurling the structure of credit which rested upon it into ruin. Congress was induced to repeal the Silver Purchase act, but by this time business was depressed and the Government revenues became deficient. In 1894, with great accumulations of idle currency in the financial centres, gold continued to shrink from under it, and to be drawn out of the United States Treasury for export, and the Government was driven to desperate shifts to maintain the redemption fund. An unfriendly Congress obstructed instead of aiding its efforts, and a pestilential agitation began for curing the disease that ravaged the industries and trade of the land by deluging it with the virus that caused it, through a free and unlimited coinage of the still depreciating silver. The Government struggled heroically with its own task, and succeeded in maintaining gold payments.

So things pulled along until the campaign of 1896, with its sound-money issue and the feeling of doubt and suspense, which led people to hoard money. The result of the election was taken as an assurance of sound money and brought relief, and in the meantime crops were better, the foreign demand improved, and symptoms of reviving trade appeared. The Dingley tariff and the Bimetallic Commission, instead of immediate action on sound-money measures, were somewhat disquieting, but in 1897 money was plenty and the banks began to make better use of it. Crops were good here while they were short abroad, and prices recovered. Exports increased largely, activity developed in the railroad business, and manufactures began to awake from their lethargy. Better times were clearly in prospect.

In more than one sense the Spanish war of 1898 was a godsend to this country. The measures providing for new revenues and authorizing new Government loans burst the narrow restraints of the earlier policy and saved us from the inevitable embarrassments of the Dingley act. They provided for large disbursements and furnished the Treasury with a surplus, much of which, derived from internal taxes, was left on deposit in National banks. Again we were favored with abundant crops and a good demand for our products abroad; foreign trade expanded; our exports increased enormously, and the balance turned back the current of gold, as well as brought investments home, while our manufactures received the impulse of new and vigorous life. Railroads were busy all the year and began the work of extension and improvement, thereby giving a further impetus to the industries concerned with their construction and equipment. The supply of gold in the country attained an unprecedented volume, and dispelled illusions about the need of a bimetallic standard and the potency of silver. This tide has gone on swelling with the increasing activity of industry and trade, but will its "compulsive course ne'er feel retiring ebb"?

The crisis of 1893 and the depression that followed it were primarily due to the unsoundness of our currency system and to fear that we might drift or be driven from our hold upon the gold standard. The obvious and urgent lesson of that experience is that we should put our currency at once upon an impregnable basis, so that the credit system of the country cannot again be shaken by fear of the insecurity of its foundation. That would put an end to the greatest peril to our prosperity in case some untoward event should give it a check.

A season of poor crops can only be a calamity from which all industries and all trade will suffer more or less. But we are favored with such a wide range of soil and climate and such a variety of natural products that there is not likely to be a disastrous failure for us unless we become too much dependent upon ourselves for markets. The greatest benefit of a highly developed system of manufacturing industries is that it gives us the world to depend upon instead of making us self-dependent and therefore helpless when disaster befalls our domestic supplies. To be able to buy our supplies in case of need we must be making things with which they can be bought, and making them under conditions that will enable us to sell them outside of our own country.

In other words, one safeguard of prosperity is a wide market for a great variety of the products of labor and constant access to that market on the easiest terms.

If we should lose a large part of our wheat crop it would be a calamity, but if, with an abundant cotton crop we were making cloths for Russia and India and Australia, it might not be widely disastrous, as it certainly would be if our manufactures did not go beyond our own borders. If any scourge should deprive us of a large share of our year's provision of meat, we could obtain the needed supply if we were selling large amounts of manufactures of metals in meat-producing lands, and we could thereby escape in a great measure the calamitous effect upon general industry and trade.

One danger in prosperous times is said to be "overproduction," a term which can never mean too much production of useful things for the benefit of the world. As a disadvantage, it can only mean too much production of something for the market that is accessible to it. In a restricted market—a "home market"—it is easy to overproduce under the stimulus of good times, especially if prices are advancing out of a period of depression, but if the wide markets of the world are open to our trade and we are watchful of their needs, we are in little danger of overproducing. A policy of protection and restricted markets always tends to "overproduction" and reaction. It is the prolific source of bad times following good times, and we shall never escape these fluctuations of fortune until we cultivate and develop our trade with the world as we increase our production and multiply our industries at home. Our chance of lasting prosperity will be enhanced by every "open door" for trade and every extension of our commercial relations with the world beyond the seas.

But the greatest peril to prosperity is an overexpansion of credit and an abuse of the confidence which alone can give stability to credit. It will bring a time when advances can no longer be freely made and security will be closely scrutinized. A sudden check will be put upon speculative undertakings and send a shudder through all the overwrought fabric of outstanding credit obligations, which are insufficiently supported by substantial values. Credits must be curtailed and settlements exacted, and there comes a crisis and a crash, with a period of depression and of slow and painful recovery.

Have we not already had some clear notes of warning of the peril that may beset our present era of prosperity, which is only fairly under way? There is every prospect of a remedy of the fundamental defect of our money system and the removal of that danger. Our means and capacity of production show no sign of diminution, and there is nothing to menace the fruitfulness of their operation, apart from calamity that cannot be foreseen or averted, provided we take advantage of the world's need of the products of our resources and labor in all its wide markets.

But the danger of giving credit too readily to speculative schemes and encouraging an expansion beyond the safe limits of value already casts a shadow upon our skies. Early in this year, when the impulse of a renewed prosperity was strong upon us, when loanable funds were abundant in the market, and credit was soaring on the wings of fresh confidence, and when prices were advancing under a stimulus which was not wholly a recovery of values from former depression, the temptation to expand and to speculate upon the chances of the future was irresistible, and some of the less prudently managed of our financial institutions did not hesitate to minister to its cravings. Money and credit to the amount of thousands of millions in a few months were blown into industrial undertakings, many of which were of doubtful promise except for the opportunity of unloading "securities" upon a confiding public.

For the last month or so we have been witnessing some of the milder consequences of this manner of using the opportunities which prosperity brings. It is so early in the prosperous era, its main conditions are so sound and promising, confidence is so firm, and prospects are so hopeful that the harm has been limited; but there is a lesson and a warning in the experience of the year.

To make an immovable standard of value is not the sole necessity. That assured, the base of the great fabric of credit must be broad and liberal, so that when a resort to actual values is forced they shall not prove unequal to the emergency, which means that there must be in banks and fiduciary institutions a reserve of funds in actual money which will meet the exigencies of a troubrous time and afford a bulwark of confidence. The most urgent lesson of all, perhaps, is the necessity of giving the institutions through which credit operations are carried on an adequate control over the instruments of their trade. The money market should work under the influence of the laws of supply and demand and under skillful and watchful management, without the intervention of external forces directed by the Government. Dependence upon such forces, which may not always be readily applicable or wisely directed, is itself one of the incidental dangers which threaten prosperity.

The Value of Industrials.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES
By Thomas L. Greene,

Author of "Corporation Finance."

In view of the severe liquidation to which industrial shares have during the last fortnight been subjected, it may be a proper time to bring forward some general reflections upon the industrial situation and upon the bonds and shares of those combinations which have been pressed for sale in Wall Street.

That some corporations formed during the last year or two were capitalized at excessive figures is beyond dispute. It is also true that the men who lent their names to such reckless capitalization of legitimate combinations must take a heavy burden of responsibility; for there can be no doubt that, outside of the dearness of money, inflation in some companies led directly to distrust of others. But even here it is well to ask ourselves in what overcapitalization consists. It is not good financing to capitalize a company at only the value of its tangible assets—as if any sum over that value was "water." A manufacturer who does not on the average earn considerably more than the usual rate of interest upon the actual cost of his plant might better go out of business and invest his money in bond and mortgage. Business men consider themselves entitled to at least 12½ per cent. upon their actual capital. If then, assuming high earnings when forming a combination, a banking house should issue preferred and common stock in amounts each equal to the value of the plant, it would not be stock watering. The difference between cost of plant and earning capacity, whether we call it value of patents and trade-marks or goodwill, is just as legitimate an asset of a company as its merchandise, though harder to appraise properly. Shares of a combination, therefore, when issued in amounts beyond the values of plants, cannot because of that fact alone be called worthless. Such shares are to be judged as to their exact worth by all the circumstances of the case, particularly through independent appraisals of property and of earnings.

It is also to be said that the capitalization of the watered industrials has not been as reckless as was the flotation of railroad bonds and stocks a score of years ago. Recollection or study will convince us that the promoters of that period were governed by no rule in issuing securities except the limitation of their sales to the public. If a security was called a "bond," it was eagerly bought, no matter on what valueless property the lien might be. The losses to holders of such mortgages (to say nothing of railroad shares) were enormous. It is forgotten, too, that not more than five years ago no less than one-quarter of the railroad mileage of the United States was in the possession of receivers; and yet to-day railroad securities stand so well in the eyes of investors that they are gradually becoming absorbed by those requiring safe investments for funds of their own or those of the nature of a semi-trust. There can be no doubt that industrial shares will follow the same course, time and fuller information enabling us to discriminate between the good, the uncertain, and the bad. Those which bear the test will gradually take their place upon the Exchanges of railroad stocks put away in strong boxes of individuals and institutions. Difficulties like the finding and educating of men capable of managing large industrial enterprises will be overcome. It is well to note that some industrials have already succeeded; for example, the Procter & Gamble Company, whose shares after a ten years' trial are quoted at two and three times their par value. Yet of this company when formed it was said that it had but capitalized its advertising contracts, because the article it manufactured—soap—was open to every one to make. What one company has done many another can and will do. As to the real legal position and legal rights of companies formed for legitimate purposes, let the timid read the article by Mr. Joseph S. Auerbach in The North American Review for September.

But how shall the buyer distinguish between good and bad combinations? There is no easy answer to this question; though here again it is to be remarked that discrimination is easier now than it was formerly among railroad bonds and shares. We certainly know much more about the past and present conditions of many recently combined companies than we did about newly projected railroads in the eighties. Information of more or less importance is open to buyers of many prominent industrial shares. Usually there are statements of values and of past earnings which enable an estimate as to the future and as to the fairness of the capitalization. Was working capital provided, and if so, was it sufficient for ordinary needs? Is the new company in the hands of good business men, familiar with the trade and bearing a good reputation? Is the line of manufacturing one to promise reasonable stability and continuance? If subject to great fluctuations in volume of sales and rate of profit, how will the issue of shares fare in the years of low earnings? Certainly if no information upon these points can be had, the shares should not be purchased by the investor. But it is to just such questions that the promoters of some "trusts" have prepared careful answers, a thing almost unknown in our old-time history of promotions.

But while we are better off than formerly in knowledge of facts existing at the time of forming a combination, we yet do not know enough in many instances of the circumstances of combinations after they have become going concerns, and therein lies one of our most difficult Wall Street problems. It is clear enough that when a company offers its securities in the Street it is bound in ethics to furnish information to those who own its bonds or shares, and who thereby have become partners in the business. But, on the other hand, a manufacturing concern does not change its business position by converting a partnership into a corporation. It has its business secrets the same as before, which all experience shows must be kept from its rivals if its owners (partners or shareholders) are not to suffer loss. It cannot in justice to its stockholders throw open its affairs to the public gaze, for few or no companies have a real monopoly of trade. Moreover, the privilege of earning good profits now freely granted by public opinion to a partnership is often denied to the succeeding company, thus offering another argument for a reasonable degree of secrecy. The whole subject of profit in its economic sense is not yet understood by the general public, whose opposition to high rates of dividends has led to no little watering of capital. Thus there is an irrepressible conflict between the rights of the shareholders and their own best corporate interests. Now the matter is usually compromised by putting the shares in the unlisted department of the Stock Exchange, and, like compromises, this one seems to please few. Perhaps in time large industrial enterprises will become stable enough and secure enough in their position to make returns to the public, like our railroads; but that time is not yet. Meanwhile there seems no settlement of the difficulty in sight, unless, indeed, we call in the aid of men not identified with the corporation for an official opinion (but without details) upon the fairness of profits as claimed and upon the company's financial position and policy.

The whole subject of the purchase of industrial shares may be summed up in the exhortation—as true in finance as in morals—"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

Tunnels and Rapid Transit.

By EUGENE G. BLACKFORD.

PERMIT me to call the attention of the readers of THE TIMES to a few facts that are pertinent to the discussion now being had with regard to tunnel communication between the Boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn as compared to communication by bridges.

In all that has been written I fail to see any good, valid objections to a tunnel between the two boroughs. No one disputes that a tunnel communication would give real, actual rapid transit between the two boroughs and there can be no dispute. Nor has there been developed in the discussion any good reason why a franchise should not be granted to a corporation for the construction of a tunnel, especially as it involves no question of expenditure of money on the part of the city.

A corporation has been organized under the name of the New York and Long Island Terminal Railway Company—the incorporators of which are some of the best-known citizens of this city of undoubted financial ability—that is not seeking this franchise for the purpose of sale or speculation, but to afford an existing railroad the means of extending its route into the Borough of Manhattan, and thereby affording facilities for communication between the two boroughs, and the whole of Long Island.

This tunnel railway would afford people leaving New York in the vicinity of Broadway and Cortlandt Street a rapid transit to and through the central portion of Brooklyn, so that a passenger taking this route would reach the Brooklyn City Hall in five minutes, Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues in seven minutes, Nostrand and Atlantic Avenues in nine minutes, East New York in twelve minutes, Jamaica in twenty-five minutes, Babylon in fifty-five minutes, and in doing this they do not disturb the surface of the streets, sewers, and pipes under which the tunnel will run, and without cost to the city of one dollar. Should there be any hesitation in permitting this company to have the necessary franchise and permission at once?

This scheme of rapid transit is the result of years of patient study and investigation by a commission that was organized by direction of the Legislature of the State and has received the unanimous indorsement of the people of Brooklyn and the approval of his Honor Mayor Van Wyck.

It also provides for a great public improvement of vast benfit to the City of Brooklyn in the removal of a steam railroad that is now operating through the centre of Brooklyn to the great detriment of the city, as well as of great danger to the lives and limbs of its citizens. For the last ten years there has been prosecuted a vigorous campaign on the part of the citizens of Brooklyn for the removal of this great incubus upon the city.

This great undertaking can be completed and in operation in less than two years from the time that the railroad secures the permission of the municipal authorities.

It will at once, from the commencement of its operation, relieve the present bridge of the immense strain now testing its full capacity, and all without any cost to the city.

Permit me briefly to state the present condition of this enterprise.

The Legislature of 1897, in the act providing for this scheme of rapid transit, in Section 13 of the act, provides that the board for the Atlantic Avenue improvement shall determine when the work of the improvement shall commence, but the powers of the board are restricted by the following language contained in the section:

"But they shall not so determine until they are satisfied that an underground double-track railroad will be built from the westerly terminus of the said railroads to some convenient point at or near Malden Lane in the City of New York, as now constituted, and that a company competent and able to build such an underground railroad has secured all the necessary consents and franchises therefor, has entered upon the performance of said work, and has obligated itself to unite with the Long Island Railroad Company in operating trains to and over the railroads aforesaid, and until the said Long Island Railroad Company has secured all the necessary rights, consents, and franchises to construct the improvement herein provided for, and has agreed to pay the proportionate cost thereof as hereinabove provided. After such determination is made the work shall be prosecuted to completion with reasonable expedition."

This provision for a tunnel connecting the improvement with Manhattan Island was, in the opinion of the original commission, a most important step in advance for Brooklyn. Underground rapid transit is, to say the least, as necessary to the people of Brooklyn as to our sister borough. The benefits to be derived by Brooklyn from this connection are incalculable. They have been discussed and pictured throughout the entire city. The great relief to come from the removal of the surface steam tracks, supplemented by rapid transit to the heart of the business district of Manhattan Island, comes home to all our citizens, not only the well-to-do, but to those of moderate means, including the mechanic and laborer seeking relief in the outlying wards of Brooklyn from the congested conditions in other parts of the city.

And, more important than all, this great underground rapid transit system is to be built by private capital without the expenditure of a dollar of the people's money.

This board has proceeded with all possible expedition in the work confided to it by the Legislature. Surveys were promptly made, plans adopted, and the railroad companies were pressed to the performance of their portion of the work. Almost immediately difficulties were encountered owing to the limitations placed by the new charter upon franchises to be granted by the Municipal Council, which the Legislature had surrounded with restrictions, especially as to the length of the term, which rendered it impracticable to expend the vast sum required from private investors if this tunnel was to be built. The board, with the co-operation of the present city authorities, prepared and procured the passage of an amendment to the city charter obviating this difficulty, in a measure, by increasing the powers of the Municipal Council with reference to the term of the franchise granted to tunnel railroad companies. As in the case of the original improvement bill, this amendatory measure met with the cordial support of the public at large and the press of both Manhattan and Brooklyn. The amendatory measure was promptly approved by his Honor the Mayor and became law May 11, 1899.

The New York and Long Island Terminal Railway Company was thereupon organized.

In accordance with the provisions of the law, this corporation perfected its organization and filed the necessary maps showing its route. On June 27, 1899, it applied to the Municipal Council for the necessary permission to construct its railroad under the streets shown upon its route. Notice of the application was widely advertised; public meetings were held indorsing it, and on July 21, 1899, it was presented to a committee of the Municipal Council without opposition or question from any source.

This board, created for the purpose of carrying out the great improvement of Atlantic Avenue, attended before the Council and asked favorable consideration for the application. Confident that there could be no voice raised in opposition to a measure so beneficial to the city and its inhabitants, the board hoped for a speedy and favorable report upon the measure, and that the necessary permission would be granted by the Municipal Council without delay. More than six months have now elapsed without action upon the application.

In the meantime the board is powerless to proceed with the work of removing steam from the surface of Atlantic Avenue. This great boon to the people of Brooklyn, for which they have labored unofficially for so many years, and as a board created under the act of the Legislature of the State for two years past, is denied only because of the failure of our representatives, the Municipal Assembly, to act upon this application. The people, who for more than fifteen years past have pleaded for this great improvement, are denied the relief to which the Legislature has said they are entitled, and the board is subjected to criticisms for inaction simply because this consent is withheld.

Are the people to be compelled to go to the State Legislature to get the necessary franchises which our own Municipal Council denies them?

USE OF THE WORD "PRETTY."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mrs. Frederick Nathan, in her article on the position of women as wage earners, advanced many sound ideas; but there is one that she failed to mention, which is one I have never seen written of in any of the many articles upon the equality of woman with man, either as a wage earner or in an intellectual capacity, and that is that to a great extent her personal appearance must be ignored.

The worst enemy (although unconsciously so) to women who wish to have place equal to men is the reporter or writer who places complimentary words with all feminine words—"the pretty typewriter," "the telegraph girl moved her fingers daintily," &c. It is always "a pretty girl," "she bends her glossy head," "she raises her soft eyes," and so on ad nauseam.

In the fashion articles one reads a hat for a pretty girl is so and so. Why use the word pretty? In the first place, are not the plain ones to have stylish hats? How would it look to read in a man's fashion magazine, "a derby for a pretty boy," or would it not be ridiculous to see "the lawyer's handsome young man?" "The room clerk at the hotel raised his fine eyes as he said No. 97." And why not? If women are to take rank as men, and the men do women's work, let by all means the men have the pleasure of having their appearance appreciated; or else the women should (if they wish to be considered equal with men) give up all idea of having themselves noticed or admired.

I know that usually it is the few that make the many suffer, and thus the few vain women who perch themselves up in down-town offices and try to be admired affect the honestly working wage earner.

I have for a long time been watching to see when the public prints would give up putting the words "pretty," "dainty," "stylish," "graceful," &c., before the feminine noun, and it has been astonishing to me that the writers (many of whom are women) have not noticed themselves that their use of complimentary words was keeping back the advancement of their sex.

Street Railway Operation.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES
By H. H. Vreeland,

President of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company.

In my opinion, the growth of the transportation business in the City of New York during the last thirty years will bear favorable comparison in percentages to that of any other known industry, and I am brought to this conclusion by the fact that in 1872, according to the official figures, the whole number of people transported by railways of all kinds within the city limits was 138,889,439; that in 1882 the number had grown to 250,510,832; that in 1892 it had further increased to 448,947,981, and that conservative estimates justify the belief that in 1902 it will exceed 600,000,000.

The first great impetus to this business was given in the year first named by the opening of the elevated railroad, and during the last seven years it has been phenomenally augmented, first, by the substitution of cable for horse power on the surface roads, and later, by the substitution of electricity. Further than to broadly state that the facility of movement has been more largely responsible for this than the increase of population or any other cause is not necessary here. The figures are merely mentioned, in order to open the mind of the general reader to some idea of the proportions of the task put upon transportation companies. Even to a railroad man, these stupendous figures are an astonishment, when he considers the limited mileage on which the work is done.

The increase of this business has naturally increased the demand for labor, and with the novelty of the means and the increased facility in speed and carrying capacity has come a demand for greater intelligence, with the result that there is now in existence in New York a body of over 15,000 men graduated from the ranks of miscellaneous labor, who are gradually being distinguished as experts in a difficult field of labor calling for intelligence, amiability, and endurance far beyond that possessed by their predecessors in the business fifteen, or even ten, years ago.

On the Metropolitan system alone there are about 4,000 or 5,000 of these men, who, realizing that they are a class, have organized themselves for mutual improvement and betterment, and who have since they organized shown their ability to conduct their own affairs in a way at once preservative of their rights and those of the corporation in whose service they are.

These preparatory remarks were necessary in order to fully explain what, to my mind, as a workingman, is the most significant trend in local railway management. I have always been particularly interested in the social condition of the men with whom I worked, and those whom I have had under me, and I think there has been no more interesting or instructive tendency developed under my observation than this self-same organization among a newly created class of workers.

Twice since the organization of the Metropolitan Street Railway Association, questions have arisen concerning management and operation, which have been discussed and adjusted between the employes of the corporation and the corporation, without the necessity of strike, without loss or injury to either property or labor, and without the aid of persons who have no real interest in either.

The history of a concern which has, if it never had anything else, as much as this to its credit, must be interesting to every one who concerns himself with the affairs of labor, and I therefore think I could do no better by way of illustrating a tendency in street railway operations than to give a brief account of this association, its purposes, and what it has accomplished.

It was organized about four years ago for the purpose of mutual protection and improvement among the employes of the Metropolitan Street Railway system, and in that time, without anybody's patronage, it has collected and distributed $50,161.83. It has provided medical attendance and medicines for 5,017 patients. It has paid out in death and sick benefits $40,265.35. It has accumulated a surplus of $9,896.48, $5,000 of which its Trustees, of their own motion, have invested in the securities of the company for which they work.

It has procured a library of about 2,500 volumes, and it is augmenting in membership day by day.

It has done me the honor of electing me President, and I am so afforded an opportunity of meeting not only my heads of divisions, and the responsible Superintendents of the operation of the property, but also all my men, with whom I have frequent opportunity to discuss their affairs. The close touch thus established between the head of a great property and the individuals who constitute its operating force is in innumerable ways of benefit both to my men and to myself. Rules and regulations for their conduct are discussed and justified from time to time, and I venture to say that no such large class of men anywhere in the States are as thoroughly informed of the reasonableness of the rules that govern them as are those employed on the Metropolitan Street Railroad.

The theory that a great mass of men can be best governed by some one entirely isolated from them is not justified by my experience, and as I took occasion to say at the seventeenth annual meeting of the Street Railway Association of the State of New York, when the subject of the relationship of managers to men was up for discussion, "I think that a wider recognition of the fact that a street railway employe has, after all, some use as a member of human society beyond collecting fares and working the brake would help the solution of some of our difficult problems in the management of property."

The result of the establishment of this association among my men has been to create an esprit de corps that has manifested itself in many striking ways, an esprit de corps which the public is beginning slowly to recognize.

I have selected this particular tendency for the reason that I regard it as the most interesting. The public at large, I take it, can feel but a passing interest in tendencies that relate to the mere matters of mechanics or operation. It is to the human side of things, after all, that the last appeal is always made, and while the reformations and advances that have been achieved under the enlightened policy of the owners of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company are of world-wide notoriety, I think that this little sketch of the recent and successful effort of its operating force will be of more interest than an extended review of the tendencies that have brought us from the slow-moving, ram-shackle horse cars to the present eight-wheel, swift-moving, well-lighted vehicles of to-day.

The Story of Germany's Industrial Progress.

By JAMES C. MONAGHAN,

United States Consul at Chemnitz.

THE record of Germany's progress in recent years reads like romance. The work done by the men who made the empire—the old Emperor, Bismarck, Moltke, and von Roon—has been ably supplemented by the efforts and tireless energies of William II., Hohenlohe, von Buelow, Thielmann, and Miquel. The broken, discordant empire, made up of as motley a political mixture as ever existed, is to-day a united, homogeneous force, leading the long line of Continental States. The work of the schoolmaster was well done before Metz, Strasburg, Sedan, and Paris. A better work has gone on since. The victories of peace, of political wisdom, economic skill, scientific achievement, are among the greatest ever recorded. In every department of national life the empire has been progressing. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures have found friends at Court. The scientific side of farming has had earnest, honest, eloquent advocates. Their success has more than justified their enthusiastic arguments. They have turned or are turning the agricultural elements from extensive to intensive farming. How successful they have been is shown by the record of the receipts from the sugar-beet root crops. By careful selection, the beets produced now yield enormous percentages, compared with other years. Many parts of the empire, those nearest to the large cities, are being turned over to market gardening. In thirty years the population has changed. In 1871 57 per cent. of the entire population was engaged in agricultural pursuits, the rest in commerce and manufactures. To-day the figures are reversed, 67 per cent. following commerce and manufactures, the rest remaining on farms.

COMMERCE.

The Emperor, who has been named the best representative of his race in the world, has said that the empire's future lies on the water. ("Deutschland's Zukunft liegt auf dem Wasser.") If the work in agricultural circles was well done in the years since 1870, that done for commerce was better. There is no record in history like that of Germany's maritime progress in the last thirty years. From an insignificant, subordinate, dependent position, the empire has become a great maritime and mercantile power. Hamburg has gone ahead of Liverpool; Bremen is rapidly rivaling the best and biggest English lines. Not a nation is unknown to German sailors. Lines go out to every part of the globe. To tell half what the Hamburg Line has done would require a big book. The Emperor has made up his mind to make the empire if not England's equal as a colonial power, at least her rival wherever new colonies are to be acquired. Enormous subsidies have been granted to the North German Lloyd. That line has been encouraged to open up communication with Eastern, African, South American, and Australian countries. Quite recently the entire outfit of a British company carrying on trade with the East was bought up by the Bremen Lloyd.

Ships have been sent to Vladivostock. Hamburg houses have opened agencies in the most remote regions of Eastern Siberia for the purpose of selling and buying. South America pays tribute to German ports. The power exercised in some of those ports by the empire is hardly equaled by the combined powers of all other people. In shipbuilding, England, Scotland, and Ireland have found a most formidable rival. The fastest of the ocean steamers—Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse—was built in Germany. Some of the biggest and best boats afloat were made in the empire. The history of the Hansa towns in the palmy days of their greatest prosperity is to bear no comparison with the record of recent years when it is written. Krupp has just built a magnificent shipbuilding plant at Stettin. Hamburg has more than held her own in freight as well as fast steamers. That city had in 1841-5 146 sailing ships, with a tonnage of 25,722, and three steamers, with a tonnage of 895; in 1893 it had 631 sailing ships, tonnage 618,488, and 337 steamers, tonnage 421,731. Since 1893 the largest and best boats have been built. All over the empire, far inland, in cities whose citizens never saw the sea, there are organizations for raising funds to increase the navy. The Emperor's wishes are regarded as laws. His intelligent advocacy of extending commerce has met universal approval.

There are 54,000,000 people in Germany. The population increases at the rate of 700,000 or 800,000 every twelve months. These vast masses must be provided for. The empire's capacity is limited. An effort is being made or may soon be made to divert the vast stream of emigration hitherward into parts where its influence will make for much that will aid the empire. To-day two provinces of Brazil are thickly settled by Germans. In those parts German is spoken. There are German schools, newspapers, unions, churches, &c. Consul Seegar says they have no political parts or purposes to carry out.

How helpful, however, must such people be to those at home! Does one need to wonder when told that Germany's influence in South America is increasing? I read recently that an effort is to be made by the people at home to aid Germans going out to foreign parts by giving them information as to those parts. There isn't an important part of this earth to-day that hasn't its German agency of some kind keeping the old country posted.

MANUFACTURES.

If the empire has been prosperous and progressive in agriculture and commerce, it has surely been such in manufactures. Nor is it to such houses as Krupp's that one is to look for the signs of recent success. One must go to Crefeld, Elberfeld, Bremen, Aix la Chapelle, Berlin, Chemnitz, and Leipsic. Germany is not remarkably rich in natural resources. While it has quite large deposits of coal, iron, lime, &c., it has to import annually 1,000,000 tons of English coal and large quantities of Swedish and Spanish iron. It buys 2,400,000 bales of our cotton, some in India and Egypt, wool and hides in La Plata and Australia. These it makes up into useful and artistic articles for the markets of the world. There is no subject so interesting to students of economic thought as is the industrial growth of Germany. Many of its cities learned their lessons in manufactures from England, France, and ourselves. To-day they have taken lead in their lines. Chemnitz leads Nottingham in hosiery, knit goods, and lace. The empire's industrial power has penetrated Russia. Mills are being built at Lodz, Moscow, and other parts of Muscovy by German mechanics and German capital.

One of the strongest influences in Russia to-day industrially is German. Most of the banking as well as mill-building business is in German hands. Engines, locomotives, war material of all kinds, textiles, &c., are sold to the East, Australia, South America, and to ourselves. We take from Germany about $100,000,000 worth of manufactured articles every twelve months. In electricity the empire is said by some to lead even this Republic. It leads the world in chemistry. Quite recently its chemists added a series of distinguished successes to the already long list put down to its credit. For twenty years the dream of chemists has been the production of a substitute for natural indigo.

The Baden Aniline Company has found it. That company, (with one or two other German concerns, is said to control the aniline dye markets of the world. That house is said to have 150 to 200 chemists doing nothing day and night except experimenting. "Made in Germany" has done more to help Germany than any amount of advertising could have done. Buyers in far-off lands, that looked once to London and Liverpool for their supplies, turn now to towns in the German Empire.

WAGES.

Wages in Germany are tending upward. In ten years they have advanced 20 to 25 per cent. The workingman's lot has been made easier by means of old-age, invalid, and accident insurance. The system owes its origin to Bismarck and the old Emperor. It has been encouraged and confirmed by the present ruler. It guarantees against poverty and the poorhouse. The original scheme was for the manufacturers, empire, and help to contribute each one-third of the amount necessary to support the system. To-day the manufacturers, as a rule, pay two-thirds and the State the rest. The system has proved so successful that England is being urged to adopt it.

Will all this continue? There is no good reason for pessimistic arguments anent Germany's position and progress. Nothing would surprise thoughtful men more than to see the empire fall away from its present proud position at the head of Continental States. Should the Dutch Queen marry a German Prince, an alliance with Holland might easily be made possible; nor would such be unprofitable for the little kingdom. It would gain Saxony, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, &c., have lost nothing by their alliance, amalgamation, or whatever one wants to call it, with the great empire. While it is true that the citizens of these kingdoms, duchies, &c., have forgotten to call themselves Saxons, Bavarians, &c., they find so much more in the prouder title German that they have no longing to go back to the old. What the next century has in store for Germany is a question. The future belongs to the nations rich in certain natural resources—coal, iron, and lime.

These Germany has in abundance. Ours and England's are better; but not so much better that German thrift, energy, intelligence, &c., will not help to keep her where she is now, away up near the head of the column of industrial and commercial States. Time was when Italy, Spain, and Portugal led. Those were the great world powers, with empires wide in latitudes and far-reaching in longitudes. With the discovery of coal in England, in the age of Elizabeth, and in Belgium a few years before the Netherlands and England went out and won their way to proud and strong positions, particularly as colonizers. The absence of coal in Spain, Italy, Portugal, that is, in anything like profitable quantities, handicapped those countries. England, for its size, is rich, very rich, in coal, iron, and lime, so, too, is Belgium. Germany has these and other things. She has a system of education unsurpassed in any age or country. Her technical education has won for her first place as a cheap producer.

There is no argument in the assertion that her wares are worthless because cheap. They are what are wanted. No nation studies the needs of other nations as do Germans. England was once full of the empire's eager youth, learning not only England, but English methods of manufacturing and markets. Bismarck said once that the future belongs to the nation with the schools. "Wer die schule hat, hat die Zukunft," was his way of putting it. On the testimony of English, French, and Belgium commissions, Germany has the very best system of technical, industrial, and industrial art education on earth. Sir Philip Magnus, Sir A. Levin Smith, and others, interested in introducing industrial and industrial art education into England, urging its importance, refer invariably to what it has done for the Germans. With these they have won their way. In recent years they have added commercial and higher commercial education to the system. The Emperor, by granting to Charlottenburg the right to give doctors' degrees equal to those of Leipsic, has lifted scientific education to altitudes high as those so long held by the classics. Nor is it in the big cities that Germany has her best schools. Plauen, with only 60,000 souls, situated in the heart of the mineral mountains, 100 miles from Dresden or Leipsic, has one of the best textile schools on earth. Eibenstock, a mountain town of less than 20,000, has a school in which not only the industry of lace making is taught, but its ornamental aesthetic, or artistic side. Saxony, a little kingdom of less than 4,000,000 souls, has nearly 300 technical, i. e., industrial and industrial art schools.

CONSULAR SYSTEM.

To its excellent diplomatic and consular system the empire owes much of its success. Both of these branches of the Foreign Office furnish their share to the commercial. Experts are being attached to the Consular and Diplomatic Corps. The whole Consular Service is to be reformed and rebuilt on a basis eminently practical and businesslike. Commissions are sent all over the world to study foreign markets and to collect samples. Colonial and export unions or societies are organized at home for the purpose of encouraging export trade. Facts are collected and furnished for nominal sums. In parts of the empire English and French are obligatory in the public schools. When trade treaties are under consideration, Consuls are called home to act as counsel or an advisory board. Mutual concessions are made by manufacturers of one district for the benefit of manufacturers in another. Wisdom is in all their work.

PATENTS AND INVENTIONS.

The record of the imperial Patent Office is one of the best in the world. The idea so long held that the Germans are not inventive is not borne out by the facts. Before the imperial patent law went into effect, in 1878, it was necessary to take out patent rights in something like twenty-five or thirty petty principalities, duchies, and kingdoms. To-day it is different. Rights are imperial—i. e., good in any part of the empire. Once obtained, they are worth a great deal. There is no better Patent Office on earth than the German. A people that gave the modern world the printing press, gunpowder, Thomas à Kempis, Spinoza, Kant, Goethe, Schiller, the Humboldts, &c., has as many claims to original thinking as any other. No greater mistake is ever made than to misrepresent or underrate a rival. I say rival because we are bound to bump up against the empire in every part of the world. She is here in our midst. Broadway, New York; Chicago, &c., lend eloquent pages to the story of the empire's triumphal march in all that makes for material prosperity. Last year the empire's exports increased $29,000,000; England's fell off $109,000,000, and ours went up over $300,000,000. This year they will go further. But one must bear in mind that Germany's resources are not as rich as England's, or ours.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION

Wall Street's recent panicky shake-up has been followed by a recovery that extends from half a dozen to a dozen points—and significance is in the fact that not a few stocks, nor isolated groups, but almost the whole list has joined in the quick improvement. Judged by signs like this, it looks as if there had been more manipulation than actual liquidation. The year closes with advances as a rule in comparison with market values of record at last New Year's.

Professional Wall Street now divides its attention into three parts—gold exports, general money market movements, and foreign war developments. Yesterday's steamers carried abroad something over $5,000,000 of American gold and exchange authorities seem to count upon a larger outgo during the coming week. In so far as the rank and file of Wall Street men are concerned, however, gold shipments by themselves can have small bad effect. Deeply seated is the belief that this country has not only plenty of gold to spare, but that in supplying it now to Europe we are building up an international credit which later can be turned into extraordinary home benefits.

Touching money market conditions here, yesterday's bank statement was not very illuminating. So varied and complex are the factors entering into the making of current bank statistics that almost any theory can be evolved. What is better than ingenious argumentation is the confidence which bankers of experience are showing that hurtful stringency is not to be apprehended, in so far, at least, as legitimate business interests are involved. It may be, say even those who are optimistic, that speculators on the Stock Exchange will have at times to pay sharp advances for accommodation, but more prophecies in banking circles count on lower than higher rates after the middle of January. Few prophecies can, however, be relied upon explicitly just now, for operating influences are not all readily measurable.

Foreign war advices count effectively upon sentiment here, Wall Street committing itself thoroughly to the theory that as British fortunes go up or down, so ours are affected—or, at least, so the money markets of the world must be affected. Boer victory might hurt American stocks almost as much as it would British ones, while British victory might get as prompt response in the New York market as at London. British consols, for the time, are the financial barometer.

Wall Street has given during the week much attention to Brooklyn Rapid Transit affairs, the reward of $25,000 for the detection and conviction of adverse rumormongers, and the urgent call upon the Grand Jury to bring about their indictment, commanding extraordinary consideration. The Grand Jury having adjourned without action and the $25,000 reward being still unclaimed, leaves the Street uncertain as to what may be the Brooklyn Rapid Transit's market situation, and bearishness on Brooklyn Rapid Transit stock may not be much diminished by the advertising and judicial campaign; but it may be counted upon, for a time at least, that Wall Street will be much less inclined to concoct or distribute unverified tales calculated to do damage to market values. To that extent the official Brooklyn Rapid Transit action has been helpful—and that quite beyond its own direct interests. Never before in Stock Exchange history has there been such affluence of sensational rumors intended to be demoralizing as was recently the rule, and action that brings conspiracy of such sort to a halt cannot fail to have the approbation of every right-minded man.

But there is another side. Putting Brooklyn Rapid Transit itself aside, it can be taken as indisputable that as long as there is mystery there must be suspicion—not unnaturally and not improperly. Wall Street suffers from no other plague so hurtful as that which is inflicted by blind pool policies—while the Stock Exchange shirks responsibility and duty. This cannot proceed indefinitely. It is imposition upon investors and does deadly damage, as well, to Wall Street's brokerage business, for every loss that a scheme of secrecy imposes has influence finally upon the public's relations and the public's confidence in Stock Exchange functions. It is no impossibility that Stock Exchange authority is called upon to establish—it is hardly a matter of difficulty even; for at the behest of the Governors of the Exchange not a single property whose shares have quotation could afford to persist in blind poolism. It may be, as is of record in Sugar Trust history, that Directors might declare that they cared not at all whether their securities were or were not quoted on the Stock Exchange. But that sort of opposition is pretense, and managers of corporations persisting in such policy would quickly find themselves dismissed by security owners, who, under such circumstances, would be sure to rise superior to the chronic apathy which so much affects and afflicts investment interests. The New York Stock Exchange can much better get along without stocks representing blind pools than can sponsors for such stocks get along without the Stock Exchange.

It is a short-sighted view which checks official Stock Exchange action. Sooner or later what is fair and honest—what is necessary—must come. Meanwhile any other corporation whose affairs are not properly disclosed to investors can with slight propriety object to suspicions, however unjust, however crudely hippodromed even in the interests of adverse stock jobbers. Mysteries available for unwarrantably putting up quotations are not one whit less baneful than mysteries which invite attack and promote depression. In this New Year's time the New York Stock Exchange should make some new resolutions and put them promptly into effect—provided the New York Stock Exchange cares a jot for public confidence.

Yesterday's market was marked by buoyancy beyond any daily record for a long time. Some substantial buying was evident for investment account, and there were transactions in conspicuous parts of the market by bear traders indisposed to go over New Year's short of stocks which might be helped by developments of favorable character. Many quotations rose more than a whole point; and, after all, Wall Street had cheerfulness in its brief two-hour session on the last business day of the year. And forecasts in speculative circles were brighter than any that have recently had fashion there.

OUTSIDE SECURITIES.

Transactions in the market for outside securities on the final day of the year's trading developed notable strength in almost every quarter of the market, and closing quotations showed many substantial advances. In the good tone displayed in the market during the past few days was found an indication of the course the market is likely to follow at the opening of the new year, and the signs were of the most encouraging character. Buyers competed with each other to secure stocks, and in some issues advances of as much as 5 points were recorded. Anything like fear as to the immediate future of the market would seem to be entirely dispelled, and buying was of the kind that showed that to a very large degree the confidence shaken by recent events in the outside market has within the last few days been re-established. Transactions were in larger amount than on any day since last week, and the demand for stocks extended to some issues which, even during the recoveries of the early part of the week, found but a poor market.

DISTILLING OF AMERICA was made particularly prominent by a very sharp rise in the preferred stock and by a fairly large advance in the common. Trading was active in both issues, though the supply of preferred stock proved to be much smaller than that of the common. In the former the price advanced to 27, and it closed at 27 oid, a net gain of 4½ points. Sales of the common stock were made as high as 8⅝, and this was bid for the stock at the close, showing an advance of 1¼ points. Better prices for the stocks were due in part to the favorable impression made by the fact that the committee recently appointed by some of the stockholders is being given by the company every facility to investigate the condition of its business. That the work of the committee is to be carried on in a more amicable manner was believed likely to lead to better results and is naturally viewed somewhat in the light of a removal of opposition that might have proved very unfavorable to the status of the Distilling stocks.

AMALGAMATED COPPER was more active than on any day this week. It enjoyed a considerable advance, selling as high as 81 and closing at 80⅝ bid, a net gain of 1 point. In the absence of bear attacks which were reflected in the low prices recently established for Amalgamated Copper it responded easily to the improved condition of the market and appeared to show more strength than at any time of late.

AMERICAN BICYCLE, which sold on Friday at 15, advanced to 18 and closed at 17 bid, a net gain of 2 points. Bids for the bonds fell back to 92½ and closed at that figure, against 93½ bid on the previous day. It was said that recent sellers of Bicycle common have now become buyers of the issue and were taking back stock which they sold early in the week. This change in position was attributed to purchases of the stock made by insiders, who are said to have taken much of the stock which has recently been offered.

ELECTRIC VEHICLE showed notable strength and enjoyed the largest net gain recorded during the day. It advanced 10 points to 73 on a few sales and closed at 70 bid, a net gain of 7 points. It is felt that the arrangements recently made by the Electric Vehicle Company to increase its manufacturing facilities will soon be reflected in the company's earnings, both directly and through its connections with the several transportation companies. All along the difficulties in the way of procuring a sufficient number of vehicles has been viewed as one of the most unfavorable circumstances affecting these stocks.

ILLINOIS TRANSPORTATION, which for many days past, in fact, for a number of weeks, has met with very little demand, sold to the extent of 1,300 shares at 2¾. At the close 2¾ was bid for the stock, and it was held considerably above that figure. Some of the other transportation stocks also showed improvement, all favorably affected by the prospects of these companies soon being able to put in operation a considerable number of new vehicles.

RUBBER GOODS common again advanced to 28, and closed at 28 bid, a net gain of 2 points. For the preferred stock 77 was bid and none was offered.

PHILADELPHIA PRICES.

Special to The New York Times.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Selected Extracts in Prose and Verse from Periodicals.

New Year's, 1900.

One greeting more to one of noble fame,
Our comrade since our birth; our fathers', too;
Into whose springtime hopes our grandsires came,
Whose promises to them for us came true.

What struggles and what gains have filled his day!
What peerless triumphs of a mind set free!
What stubborn shrinking, oftentimes, to pay
The woeful birthplace of the is-to-be.

Hoary, sublime, deathless yet doomed to die,
No other New Year's dawning his shall be.
Vouchsafe him, Time, such end that men shall cry—
"Grand was thy passing, Nineteenth Century!"

—E. S. MARTIN in Scribner's.

Questions of Art.

From The Saturday Review.

One person of taste will give the palm to the furniture of Chippendale; another will prefer the French style of the period of Louis Quatorze, of Louis Quinze, or of the Empire; and there is an immense amount of furniture, no matter what its style, which all persons of taste will agree in pronouncing intolerable. But each piece of furniture, bad, good, or indifferent, has accidentally aesthetic qualities, which are quite independent of its design, and which could never be even suggested in any auctioneer's catalogue. They are qualities coming to it—constantly and indefinitely changing—from the position in which it is placed, from the way in which lights fall on it, from the relation of its curves and colors to the other objects that are near it, and also from the historical or social suggestions which it conveys. Some old harpsichord, of the meanest and most awkward design, will give to a faded room in which it has grown old, a mellowness and beauty which the most magnificent of modern instruments would destroy. The unintended process of fading will give colors to walls and carpets which no dyer on earth could equal.

Few objects, as works of art, can be uglier than most modern racing-cups; yet the play of light on their silver surfaces, and the streaked mosaic of reflections that shine in them, will be as exquisite as if the cups themselves had been modeled by Benvenuto Cellini. Or again, let us take a garden. A garden long deserted, with the weeds hiding its walks, with its rose trees bending to the earth, and its grass, once closely shaved, growing long, and tufted, will often receive from "decay's effacing fingers" a charm deeper than any that was given to it by the care of a dozen gardeners.

A Lost Principle of Architecture.

From The Fortnightly Review.

If the visitor to Athens places his hat or other small object at the corner of one of the steps of the Parthenon and tries to sight it from the other end he will find it has sunk beneath the delicate curve in the middle which he designers saw would appear pleasanter and softer to the eye than if each step were shaped to a line of rulerlike straightness from beginning to end. All parts of the great building—the floors, architrave, and even the layers of stone that constitute the main walls—have been shown to conform to a like principle, and some portions to be curved both in a vertical and in a horizontal manner. Important as was this discovery, it does not stand alone. Mr. Ruskin has found that deliberate divergencies of a somewhat similar kind exist in the old Gothic buildings of Venice, and he considers that they were introduced so as to avoid a too obvious precision, a defect of nature, even in her most symmetrical creations—the two sides of the human face, for example. Unfortunately, Mr. Ruskin wrote in ignorance of Mr. Penrose's precise measurements and surveys, and only uses the facts, he otherwise marshalls so well, to show that Gothic architecture, being alone susceptible of such refinements, is superior to classical architecture. He seems to be in no way aware that such principles could be and were applied to classical buildings long before pointed architecture was heard of, though they are now applied to neither of these, nor to any other. Mr. Penrose being as was intended by his employers more of a scientist and a mathematician than a poet or a theorist, wanders no further into the tempting labyrinths of theory than to suggest that these "irregularities" were "perhaps" introduced because the designers fancied a curved line would look more straight at a distance than would a really straight one. As the straight lines in our English buildings look quite straight, it seems hard to suppose that the old Greek artists formed for themselves so strange an illusion.

A Substituted Editorial Article.

From The Cornhill.

Mr. Cooper, the editor of The Scotsman, tells, in his autobiography, a story of how a leader writer, (who it has been suggested was the late James Hannay,) being pressed by the printer's devil for a leading article, and having allowed the time to go by in which he could construct one of his own, took the scissors, cut out a "leader" from that day's Times, pasted it on a sheet of paper, and writing on it the headline, "What Does The Times Mean by This?" sent the whole article as his contribution to the leading columns of his own journal! It was printed as a "leader" exactly as he sent it in—simply an article from The Times headed by the query: "What Does The Times Mean by This?"

The Early Topical Song.

From The Gentleman's Magazinze.

The earliest topical song that can be traced, and probably the first in actuality, was a mock raree-show ballad, sung in the famous pantomime of "The Rape of Proserpine," at Lincoln's Inn Fields, in 1727. This was the piece, written by Lewis Theobald and set to music by Galliard, upon which Pope expended his powers of sarcasm in "The Dunciad." The ballad referred to satirized the rage for Italian operas by subscription, and the vogue of sundry foreign buffoons at the Haymarket, where their attractions had been supplemented by the rope dancing of Mme. Violante. The girding was effected in the following elementary manner:

Here be de Haymarket, vere de Italian Opera
sweetly sound,
Dat costa de brave gentry no more as Two hundred tousand pound;
A very pretty fancy, a brave gallante show,
Et juste come from France, tout nouveau.

Here be de famous comedians of the world, de troupe Italien
Dat make a de poor English veepe, because dey vil troupe home again.
A very pretty fancy, &c.,

She jump upon de rope ten stories high, and never break her neck.

Remedy for the Locust Plague.

From Chambers's Journal.

The plan consists in catching and smearing a few of the locusts with "locust fungus," a preparation which is cultivated in the Bacteriological Institute at Grahamstown, Cape Colony. The insects are then allowed to return to the swarm, which they infect with what is presumably a fatal disease. The same preparation applied on damp soil in places where it is known locusts will swarm leads to their complete destruction. Twenty swarms are said to have been destroyed in this manner. Although this statement is open to doubt, it may be remembered that a celebrated bacteriologist once proposed to deal with the rabbit pest in Australia in much the same way. It is quite possible that a similar remedy might be found for the malarial mosquito, for it is only by such means that its extirpation could be brought about.

Hungarian Cattle.

From Good Words.

The animals are bred on ranges (puszta) and are really quite wild, the cows hiding their offspring for five to six weeks in the woods, among bushes or in some secluded spot. The young calf is of a fawn color at first, but gradually changes to a gray creamy color, and finally to the shaded white peculiar to the race. As on these ranges fences are unknown, each herd is attended by the gulyas or herdsmen, who are mounted like the cowboys on American cattle ranches, and as the cattle are practically wild it is not safe, when the gulyas are absent, for a stranger to approach them. For hardihood, speed, strength, and endurance the Hungarian cattle are undoubtedly unrivaled, and they can subsist and work on a worse quality of food than any other race of cattle in Europe. Their sole food, being the natural pasture or herbage, they find on these ranges, except in Winter, when they get hay. The breeding animals at this season have grain given to them, but they alone get it. From living in this free feral state they are taken, in fact practically captured, and in time broken in to work and to bear the yoke.

Making Kava.

From Blackwood.

Taking the root stalks of the plant, two men quickly stripped away the dark outer bark, and laying the white pith on one flat stone, beat it to a pulp with another. The great kavabowl, a hollow dish supported by several feet—the whole carved out of a solid block of wood—was produced, and the bruised root placed therein, water being poured over it. The maker-in-chief then went through a process of stirring, the dregs being ultimately strained out with a bunch of hibiscus fibre.

Sanitation.

From Chambers's Journal.

Was it Lord Beaconsfield who, as Mr. Disraeli, was once twitted with being the exponent of a "policy of sewage?" According to Sir William Preece, no loftier subject can occupy the attention of man; and, according to him also, an ancestor of the great Premier—Moses, to wit—was "the greatest sanitary engineer the world had ever known," and the Book of Leviticus was "a treatise on hygiene." The Jew was the healthiest and longest-lived type of humanity, and the doctrines of Moses could be summed up as the objects of sanitation to-day—namely, (1) pure air, (2) pure water, (3) pure food, (4) pure soil, (5) pure dwellings, and (6) pure bodies. Pure air, he said, was to be found in lunatic asylums, jails, and workhouses; but not in our churches, theatres, railway carriages, or dining rooms—even the dining room of your "dearest friend."

The Self-Respecting Dog.

From The Contemporary.

No self-respecting dog will bite a female, except in the extremest need of self-defense; though I am sorry to say that the lady herself, as a rule, has no scruple whatever about punishing, to the full extent of her power, any individual of the opposite sex that happens to be inferior to her in size or strength. And indeed, like the woman in the crowded bus, she is inclined to demand her privileges as rights. A vixenish female will make more trouble in a pack of hounds than any three of the sterner sex, for whenever dissatisfied she hasn't the slightest reserve about speaking out at once, and, as her cause is extremely likely to be championed, upon general principles, by some chivalrous male, a free fight is frequently the result.

John Morley's Journalistic Instinct.

From The Cornhill.

Mr. John Morley, who was a journalist before he became a Cabinet Minister, delighted the journalists at a Press Club dinner in London a few years ago by making the following autobiographical confession: "It was whilst I was writing a leading article for a certain periodical that I received a letter from an illustrious statesman, who was then forming a Government, offering me a post in his Cabinet. Gentlemen," continued Mr. Morley, "so strong in me was the journalistic instinct that, after accepting the illustrious statesman's offer, I went back and finished that leading article! And I can assure you," he added, when the applause which greeted this statement had died away, "that neither the grammar nor the style of the latter half of the article fell short of my usual standard."

Execution of the Duke d'Enghien.

From "The Early Married Life of Lady Stanley."

Col. Laborde, knowing that the grave was actually dug in which the Duke was to be put, after a short time awakened him and told him, if he had a lock of his hair or a letter to send to any of his family, that he (Col. Laborde) would take care to forward it, and would only part with it with his life. The Duke replied, "I understand you." He cut off a lock of his hair, wrote a short letter, and desired that a confessor might be sent to him. He was soon afterward led out. Five of the soldiers refused to fire at him. They were immediately shot before his face, and their bodies thrown into a ditch. They desired to put a bandage before his eyes. He answered he had looked death in the face before, and could face it again. Seventeen soldiers fired at him. Mme. Bonaparte did everything possible to save the Duke. She implored Bonaparte on her knees, holding the skirt of his coat, which was torn off by his violent manner of going from her. She seized the other skirt, which was likewise torn off; and Bonaparte declared he would never go to bed till the Duke was dead. Lucien Bonaparte also exerted himself to the utmost, and, finding he had no success, in a rage took out a watch Bonaparte had given him, dashed it on the ground, breaking it in pieces, and said to his brother, "You will be treated in the same manner." The two brothers have never been friends since.

Christmas Roses.

Pale Winter roses, the white ghosts
Of our June roses,
Last beauty that the old year boasts,
Ere his reign closes!
I gather you, as farewell gift
From parting lover,
For ere you fade, his moments swift
Will all be over.
Kind ghosts ye are, that trouble not,
Nor fright, nor sadden,
But wake fond memories half forgot,
And thoughts that gladden.
O changeless past! I would the year
Left of lost hours
No ghosts that brought more shame or fear,
Than these white flowers!

R. J. O. in The Spectator.

Elizabethan Boys.

From The St. Nicholas Magazine.

They were carefully trained in all courtesy of speech and bearing, but repressed and kept in the background in a way that would be little relished by boys of to-day. They were advised to be "checked for silence, but never taxed for speech," or, as Sir Henry Sidney puts it in a very noble letter to his son Philip, then twelve years old, "rather be rebuked of light fellows for maiden-like shamefacedness, than of your sad friends for pert boldness. Tell no untruth; no, not in trifles," he goes on; "there cannot be a greater reproach to a gentleman than to be accounted a liar."

An Elizabethan boy was not likely to be a babbler, and in truth silence seems to have been much esteemed for all men, and Harrison tells us with pride of "the great silence that is used at the tables of the honorable and wiser sort, generallie all over the realm."

The fathers of that time sent their sons to travel on the Continent when they could, for they believed that "home-keeping youth have ever homely wits," and that "he cannot be a perfect man, not being tried and tutored in the world." So let him go, said these wise fathers, "practice tilts and tournaments, hear sweet discourse, converse with noblemen"; he will be the more ready to go out in the world and take his place with other men.

The carefully guarded boyhood was soon over, and they were marvelously young when they sprang from the quiet and seclusion of childhood into the glow and dazzle of that wondrous age—those noble Elizabethans who were soldier and sailor, courtier and councilor, in turn; taking time now and then to write a mask or a group of sonnets, or to give a helping hand to some struggling genius—to Spenser or that promising actor-manager, Will Shakespeare, perhaps. Francis Bacon entered Cambridge at twelve; so did Lord Southampton, (Shakespeare's friend and patron;) Spenser went at sixteen; Philip Sidney was sent to Oxford at thirteen, from there went to Cambridge, traveled and won golden opinions from all men before he was eighteen, and was sent on an important embassy at twenty-two.

Boer Preparation.

J. P. Fitzpatrick in The Fortnightly Magazine.

British South Africans generally believed that the Boers would not fight while England's hands were free elsewhere, but that they were quite determined to make a move as soon as a favorable opportunity presented itself. This conviction was very strong among the British in the Transvaal, for to them there was ample evidence that Mr. Krüger was looking to something beyond defending the independence of his country. In 1894 we had seen the commencement of preparations on a large scale which are to-day demanding toll in British blood. In the manifesto published before the raid, the Uitlanders complained of the £250,000 spent on Pretoria forts, £100,000 on Johannesburg fort, the importation of cannon, Maxims, and small arms, and the hiring of German mercenaries. In 1894 we had witnessed the suggestion of President Krüger to Germany for alliance. Since those days the prosecution of military works and exercises has been increasing. The signaling by heliographs and flashlights day and night; the working of searchlights from the forts; the strengthening of defenses by trenches, wire entanglements, &c.; the arrest of persons passing near the forts; the purchase of the largest and best field guns and siege guns; the importation of Mausers to arm every Dutchman in Africa; the accumulation of huge stores of meal, grain, and forage; the provision of large cold storage for frozen meat in Pretoria; the drilling of the artillery and passing of numbers of Boer youths on a sort of short service system through the artillery—all these things were signs which most of us witnessed ourselves, and for that reason they impressed us in a way in which the mere recital of them could not impress others.

The ugly feature about these preparations was that they were not ostentatious, and could not, therefore, be dismissed as "bluff." Of course, you cannot build forts on the quiet, and thus part of the programme appeared, upon superficial observation, to be merely a show for the purpose of intimidation. But there was as much secrecy as possible about the importation, moving, and distribution of the big guns and small arms, and the forts were very jealously guarded. Indeed, it seems unnecessary to emphasize this now when we have unmistakable evidence that their guns exceed, both in number and quality, anything that they were thought to possess.

Death of the Old Year.

Thy life is ebbing fast, thou aged Year!
This night that wintry sun of thine will set,
To rise no more. Thy days are told; and yet
It seems but yesterday thou didst appear!
But yesternight we watched, all silent, here,
The old Year's dying hours, while backward rolled
Its story, page by page; and now, behold!
Thy course is run. Even now thy moments wear
The fading hue of death. Farewell, old Friend!
Fain would we linger by thy side awhile,
And gather up thy mem'ries, one by one,
While, in the vacant chairs, dear faces smile
Upon us, as of old. But ever on,
Life's current bears us—swifter to the end!

—M. C. C., in Chambers's Journal.

Cromwell as a Cavalryman.

John Morley in The Century.

At Winceby or Horncastle fight (Oct. 11, 1643,) as soon as the men had knowledge of the enemy's coming, they were very full of joy and resolution, thinking it a great mercy that they should now fight with him; and on they went, singing their psalms, Cromwell in the van. The Royalist dragoons gave him a first volley, as he fell with brave resolution upon them, and then at half pistol-shot a second, and his horse was killed under him. But he took a soldier's horse, and promptly mounting again, rejoined the charge, which "was so homegiven, and performed with so much admirable courage and resolution, that the enemy stood not another, but were driven back on their own body." It was clear that a new cavalry leader had arisen in England, as daring as the dreaded Rupert, but with a coolness in the red blaze of battle, a piercing eye for the shifts and changes in the fortunes of the day, above all with a power of wielding his phalanx with a combined steadiness and mobility, such as the fiery Prince never had.

Whether Rupert or Oliver was first to change cavalry tactics is, among experts, a matter of dispute. The older way had been to fire a volley before the charge. The front rank discharged its pistols, then opened right and left, and the second rank took its place, and so down to the fifth. Then came the onset with swords and butt-ends of their firearms. The new plan was to substitute the tactics of the shock; for the horse to keep close together, knee to knee, to face the enemy front to front, and either to receive the hostile charge in steady, strong cohesion, or else in the same cohesion to bear down on the foe, sword in hand, and not to fire either pistol or carbine until they had broken through.

Carrier Pigeons in the War.

From Collier's Weekly.

The pigeon post established at Ladysmith and Durban for carrying war messages has been such a success that special appropriations for increasing the service will be recommended by the War Office. A good deal of this success of the pigeon service is due to the skill and energy of Col. Hassard of the Royal Engineers, who has spent years in pigeon culture for just this sort of an emergency, and he has demonstrated the fitness of the birds for war purposes. Col. Hassard, who was stationed at the Cape before hostilities broke out, systematically trained his pigeons for carrying messages across the rough, mountainous land, and his various pigeon posts were of the greatest value in keeping the home office apprised of the exact condition of the army.

There are 1,000 homing pigeons on the books of the British Navy, and several times this number on the books of the army. In the past ten years the United States Army and Navy Departments have been interested in the carrier pigeons, and we have posts established at different points throughout the country. Their services have been useful chiefly in the navy, and experiments are being made constantly in communicating by this means between the shore and the ships. There is no system of registering homing pigeons in private lofts, and in an emergency the Government in need of more pigeons would have to depend upon the patriotism of the private owners for increasing its supply. That there would be plenty of volunteers no one doubts a moment.

Parlor Pets.

From The Spectator.

Perhaps the most adventurous addition to the house menagerie in London is that of a hive of bees which live in a sitting room and fly out to gather honey in Hyde Park among the flowers and the blossoms of the London lime trees. The bees are reported to be as industrious and exemplary as bees should be, and not to be demoralized by such intimate association with less industrious human beings. The practical difficulty in the way of keeping bees in the house arises when the cold weather comes in, because they are tempted to carry on "work" in the house when it is too chilly for them to be abroad, and when bees are anxious to be busy with no work to hand their temper is always uncertain.

The Great Raptor.

From The Cornhill.

Wherever the great tropical forest grows, whether in the Old World or the New, a separate class of great forest eagle seems to be produced. The largest of all living raptors yet known was discovered only six years ago, and proved to be one of these forest eagles. It was found in the island of Samar, (one of the Philippines,) by Mr. Whitehead, whose death in Hainan was lately recorded. He brought the skin back to South Kensington, where it lies among the treasures of the bird department. Nothing is yet known of its habits; but the few natives who know it say that it lives on monkeys, caught on the tree tops. It seems almost incredible that so large and interesting a bird should not have been discovered before. But the tropical forest is still a possible place to find more giant eagles. It is extremely likely that some may be discovered haunting the Congo forest. In the corresponding regions of South and Central America the harpy eagle is found—a bird so large and formidable that it would seem impossible not to observe it. But the great height and thickness of the trees make the birds above them invisible. Mr. Salvin in all his travels in those regions only once saw a wild harpy eagle. In examining the skins brought over to this country, one is struck with the astonishing thickness and strength of the "wrists" and the size of the talons. Azara said that they "would kill animals of thrice their own weight." But what is their weight? Mr. Whitehead guessed that of his great eagle at sixteen pounds. The harpy is not so large. There is a species of harpy eagle in Mexico which used to be tamed to take deer.

Breakfast in a Hindu Palace.

From The Nineteenth Century.

At 12 o'clock I walked across to the palace for breakfast. Upon a small table in the hall was spread a white cloth, and on this a young plaintain leaf, whose light green color, polished surface, and tender tracery of veins, made it only too beautiful a covering for a table devoted to any material purpose. Upon this leaf were twenty cups, each with its spoon, and six tall glasses, and immediately in front of the chair a silver dish. First two Brahmin cooks, with cloths around their loins and the sacred thread across their shoulders, offered various sweetmeats in a little silver dish. The Rajah and his mother of course ate nothing, but they sat as host and hostess in chairs near the table, and the children grouped themselves upon the elevated plinth, below which the table was placed. There they laughed and talked, and played with the lilies I had picked in the morning. To do me honor they had dressed in their cloths of gold and jewels.

Meanwhile the Brahmins kept on filling the cups, and no less than fifty courses were served of different kinds of curries of fruits, curds, cakes, vegetables, and sweetmeats. The twenty cups proved altogether insufficient, and the beautiful plaintain leaf was now splashed and stained with peas, pickles, and pulses. Never was a guest more unequal to the banquet. I tasted everything in infinitesimal bites, and was gently upbraided for my want of appetite, and informed that any Brahmin would have cleared the board twice over. They are no doubt tremendous trencher-men, and the attendants of that caste listened appreciatively to this meed of praise, for the conversation was all in the vernacular. The Rani, who, it should imagine, was herself bonne fourchette, informed me she had personally assisted in the preparation of the vegetables, which deprived me of the last lingering hope of being excused from tasting any single one of fifty dishes. She looks after the housekeeping herself very closely, a fact which was apparent from the conversation during breakfast, which appropriately turned chiefly upon domestic affairs. It was told to me in Bagdad, of an Arab woman who had spent many years in England, that, asked on her return what she thought of the country, she drily remarked, "What can one think of a country in which dates and maust (curdled milk) are not available?" And amidst the lavish profusion of dishes I looked in vain for the curried lotus, of which romantic dish it is believed that my distinguished hostess and host frequently partake.

A Matter of Temperature.

From Chambers's Journal.

The little one's mother had said, "Now, doctor, if there is any rise of temperature"—she was great on temperature, by the way—"I will send for you at once. As you know, I have a clinical thermometer, and can take the temperature myself without troubling you to come in for the purpose." Just as I was going to bed I was startled by a violent ring at the bell, and, hastening to the door, saw a terrified domestic, who gasped, "Oh, Sir, please, Sir, do come round at once! Miss Marjory is worse. Missus said I was to tell you her temperature is 108, and is risin' fast."

Scarcely waiting to put on my hat, I rushed round to the house of my little patient, and discovered the whole family assembled in the sick room awaiting the end of poor little Marjory, the mother wringing her hands in agony and crying dreadfully. "What's the temperature now?" I almost shouted in my agitation. "Oh!" sobbed the mother, "I hasn't dared to look since. My poor darling! It was 108, and they say that 105 is always fatal," and she broke down completely. Without wasting any more time, I turned down the blanket, and—found that the thermometer had been thrust between the child's side and arm, and the bulb embedded in a freshly applied hot poultice!

Charms and Witchcraft.

From Appletons' Popular Science Monthly.

The Malay is a firm believer in the efficacy of charms. He wears amulets, places written words of magic in houses, and sports a tiger's claw as a preventive of disease. If he is especially primitive and backwoodsy, when he enters a forest he says: "Go to the right, all my enemies and assailants! May you not look upon me; let me walk alone!" To allay a storm he says: "The elephants collect, they wallow across the sea; go to the right, go to the left, I break the tempest." When about to begin an elephant hunt, according to Thompson, he uses this charm: "The elephant trumpets, he wallows across the lake. The pot boils, the pan boils across the point. Go to the left, go to the right, spirit of grandfather (the elephant;) I loose the fingers upon the bowstring."

The Malay believes in witches and witchcraft. There is the bottle imp, the Polong, which feeds on its owner's blood till the time comes for it to take possession of an enemy. Then there is a horrid thing, the Penangalan, which possesses women. Frequently it leaves its rightful abode to fly away at night to feed on blood, taking the form of the head and intestines of the person it inhabited, in which shape it wanders around.

Such beliefs may perhaps have their origin in metempsychosis, which in other ways has some foothold among the common people. For instance, elephants and tigers are believed sometimes to be human souls in disguise, and so the Malay addresses them as "grandfather" to allay their wrath and avoid direct reference to them. Crocodiles also are often regarded as sacred, and special charms are used in fishing for them. One such, given by Maxwell, is as follows: "Oh Dangsari, lotus flower, receive what I send thee. If thou receivest it not, may thy eyes be torn out!"

Women Play Cricket.

From The General Advertisy of 1747.

"On Monday last in playing the Women's Cricket Match the Company broke in, so that it was impossible for the game to be play'd out; and some of them being very much frightened, and others hurt, it could not be finish'd till this Morning, when at Nine o'Clock they will finish the same, hoping the Company will be so kind as to indulge them in not walking within the Ring, which will not only be a great Pleasure to them, but a general Satisfaction to the Whole. All Gentlemen and Ladies that have paid to see this Match on Monday, shall have the Liberty of the Ground to see it finish'd, without any other charge. And in the Afternoon they will play a Second Match, in the same Place, several large Sums being depending between the Women of the Hills of Sussex, in Orange Colour'd Ribbons, and those of the Dales, in Blue. The Wickets to be pitch'd by One o'Clock, and to begin Play by Two."

The Day of Battle.

Far I hear the bugle blow
To call me where I would not go,
And the guns begin the song,
"Soldier, fly or stay for long."

Comrade, if to turn and fly
Made a soldier never die,
Fly I would, for who would not?
'Tis sure no pleasure to be shot.

But since the man that runs away
Lives to die another day,
And cowards' funerals, when they come,
Are not wept so well at home,

Therefore, though the best is bad,
Stand and do the best, my lad;
Stand and fight and see your slain,
And take the bullet in your brain.

From "A Shropshire Lad," A. E. HOUSMAN.

Game in Gippsland.

From The National Review.

The kangaroo, wallaroo, and wallaby are to be found in every district. Bears are in all cool regions. The wild boar is common on the Murray, and on most of the other large rivers of New South Wales. Deer are plentiful in South Gippsland, in Birregurra, and Cook's River. The opossum is as ubiquitous as he is funny, and the dingo, pure or mongrel, which is found on the confines of all settled districts, will repay the hunter for any pains endured while chasing him. In the steppe country of South and West Australia wild horses afford some fast work to the sportsman who drives them into shares, while the slow-coach can take his fill of pleasant musings waiting at some drinking-hole for his big game to come in. Buffalo are now to be met with in large numbers in the Australian Wombats give excellent night sport, and flying foxes, squirrels, and bats of immense size afford interest to those who are able to bring them down by the light of the moon. Paddymelons, kangaroo-rats, bandicoots, tiger-cats, rabbits, and hares abound in all the Southern colonies, and stalking them affords easy, pleasant sport for those who do not care for the rough labor which bigger game entails.

Wild fowl abound in splendid variety. Pelicans, spoonbills, herons, cranes, ducks, and black swans are scattered over well-nigh every sheet of water or river. In New South Wales, South Australia, and Queensland, "native companions" and emus afford splendid rides. Cassowaries are found in Queensland and on the islands near the mainland. The lowan is interesting to the sportsman who has a taste for subtleties in nest-building and doesn't mind being fooled occasionally by a bird smarter than himself. The lyre-bird is another pretty rascal given to tricks which cannot fail to exasperate.

Wreck of the Junk.

From "The Yangtse Valley and Beyond." Mrs. J. F. Bishop.

My attention was occupied by a big junk dragged by 300 men, which, in two hours made hardly perceptible progress, slipping back constantly, though the drums were frantically beaten and the gangers rushed madly along the lines of struggling trackers, bringing their bamboo whips down on them with more sound than force. Suddenly the junk shivered, both tow ropes snapped, the lines of trackers went down on their faces, and in a moment the big craft was spinning down the rapid, and before she could be recovered by the bow-sweep she flew up into the air as if she had exploded, a mass of spars and planks, with heads bobbing about in the breakers. Quick as thought the red lifeboats were on the spot; and if the drowning wretches as they scrambled over the gunwales did not bless this most efficient of the charities of China, I did most heartily, for of the fourteen or fifteen souls on board all were saved but three.

"Justum Et Tenacem."

The quiet clouds, the quiet air,
The calm that haunts us everywhere
In these broad fields, where sunlight sees
Our homely cattle at their ease;
The woods, whose leaves of golden brown
Glide noiseless, as they flutter down;
The full, smooth river, seldom stirr'd
Save from within, that flows unheard
In irresistible advance;
And, over all this fair expanse,
The steadfast hills, that silently
Stand up against a silent sky:
Are these the things for you and me
To look upon, or care to see,
Amid the tumult of a war?

Yes; for they teach us what we are,
Or what we should be: every charm
Of outward Nature, every warm
And tender passion that expands
At sight of these familiar lands,
Speaks of the duty that we owe
To what we feel and what we know.
Were it not well, to have at length
Silence, and steadfastness, and strength;
Like Nature, in her woods and hills,
To stand unscared by doubt and ills,
Or, like her rivers, move along
Ineffably serene and strong;
Tranquil, in victory or defeat,
Until the day's work be complete?

Fools may make merry o'er our loss,
And even the wise may reel across
That line, so often tinged with blood,
Which parts the evil from the good;
But we, a nation such as we,
United, and resolved to see
A Present worthy of our Past,
We through each startling thunder blast
May still in confidence abide,
Untouch'd by petulance or pride,
Till happier years shall make it plain
That we, too, have not wrought in vain.

—ARTHUR MUNBY in The Spectator.

Which Watts?

From Sir Algernon West's Recollections.

The Cosmopolitan Club is housed in Watts's old studio, on the walls of which is a fresco of a nude woman. It was a standing joke of Stirling-Maxwell's to say to any inquirer into the subject of the picture: "You have no doubt heard of Watts's hymns; that is one of his hers."

English Rhymes to Foreign Words.

From Notes and Queries.

Byron rhymes robe de chambre with amber, empressement with chessman, the Latin male with gayly, and entombus with domos. After these specimens no one will be surprised to find in Pope, the most correct of writers, as a rule—

A frugal mouse upon the whole,
Yet loved his friend and had a soul,
Knew what was handsome and would do it,
On just occasion, coûte qui coûte.

Or Again—

The guests withdrawn had left the treat,
And down the mice sat tête-à-tête.
Our courtier walks from dish to dish,
Tastes for his friends of fowl and fish;
Tells all their names, lays down the law,
"Que ça est bon! Ah, goutez ça!"

But perhaps Pope was only ridiculing the pronunciation of French that he heard in the society of his day.

As will be obvious from the above, neither the author of "Hudibras" nor Byron appears to have had any qualms about pronouncing Latin in what is called the English fashion. The former writes boldly—

As I have done, that can say twice I,
In one day veni, vidi, vici.

"Something Hot."

From Sir Algernon West's Recollections.

D'Orsay was at a dinner at Disraeli's, which was not of a kind to suit the fashionable gourmet, and where everything had been cold. At the end of dinner there was brought in some half-melted ice in a dish. "Thank heaven!" said D'Orsay, "at last we have got something hot."

In an English Taproom. About the War.

From The Pall Mall Gazette.

On Saturday night and at Sunday dinner time the atmosphere of the tiny taproom grows thick with patriotism and shag smoke.

"What do you think about the war, Sir? Do you think they'll come out all right?"

"They'll have all their work cut out; they're in a bit of a hole at Ladysmith."

"They are in a tight 'ole," allows Hodge, the patriot, "but they'll get out of it. A man 'e says ter me ter-day: 'Ther Inglish 've found that they're in the wrong.' I says to 'im: ''Ave you got a white feather in your tail?'"

Of the origin of the war, the military and diplomatic mistakes that led up to it, the proper procedure at the present moment, the characteristics of the Boers, and a hundred apposite questions, Hodge has been at pains to inform himself perfectly.

"Why, they 'Bores 'ave got ammunition enow to last 'em seven year. Fancy that!" This was a swearing ex-dragoon, a hearty, kindly natured man, whose every word was gory. That's it, yer see; they've been gettin' ready fur it ever sin' 1881."

"That's when we ought ter a stopped an' fowt 'em."

"Ah, that was ole Billy Gladstone spoilt that fur us."

"E's dead now, ain't 'e?" (News travels slowly out here.)

"Yus," from the gorv one, "but 'e ain't cold, though; leastways, if 'e is, he didn't ought ter be."

"Is Joubert dead, Sir?"

"No, that was a mistake, and it may be just as well. He's not a bad sort."

"Better nor ole Kroojer. 'Ope they'll make 'im pay. 'E's worth five million, an' lives on a hundred an' fifty a year, an' his wife makes 'er own clo's, does 'er own washin', and darns 'is socks."

"What do you think of Krüger, George?"

"Well, Sir, I don't 'ardly know what ter think on 'im, and I reckon there's a good many others don't know what ter think on 'im, neither. Ah! they'd like ter find out where 'e is, wouldn't they, Sir? I s'pose they'll bring 'im ter Ingland, won't they, if they catch 'im?"

"Put 'im in Earl's Court," suggested traveled Mary. "Take 'im round the country in a Gospel van! My! wouldn't some people run to see 'im; they might make a pile of money!"

Loss of Life in Great Battles.

From The Fortnightly Review.

We English have, happily, been so free from war of late years that the list of casualties after each engagement has occasioned painful public surprise. It is necessary to remember that we are not now fighting with savage tribes, but with the most redoubtable marksmen in the world, armed with the latest and deadliest weapons that money can obtain. Keeping this in mind, the losses at Glencoe and Elandslaagte are not, comparatively, heavier than those recorded in many battles of the Franco-German war of 1870. At Spicheren, when the Germans stormed the French positions, they lost 223 officers and 4,871 men. During the attack on St. Privat, on the 18th of August, 1870, it has been calculated that 6,000 men of the Prussian Guard fell in the short space of ten minutes. Going further back to the days of smooth-bore cannons and the Brown Bess, the casualty roll during the Peninsular war was often quite as heavy. At the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo there were 90 officers and 1,200 men killed or wounded, 710 of these being struck down in the final assault. During the memorable assault of Badajoz the British loss was 3,500 out of 18,000 engaged, and of these 60 officers and 700 men were returned as slain, a record which would have satisfied even President Krüger's thirst for slaughter. Later on, at San Sebastian, 1,716 British officers and men were struck down in the final assault of that fortress. If these figures were worked out so as to give the percentages of losses to numbers engaged, the result would show that the recent casualties were not greater than might be expected under the circumstances of the fighting.

The Use of Sugar and Salt.

From "The Lewis Carroll Picture Book."

I may as well just tell you a few of the things I like, and then, whenever you want to give me a birthday present, (my birthday comes once every seven years, on the fifth Tuesday in April,) you will know what to give me. Well, I like, very much indeed, a little mustard with a bit of beef spread thinly under it; and I like brown sugar—only it should have some apple pudding mixed with it to keep it from being too sweet; but perhaps what I like best of all is salt, with some soup poured over it. The use of the soup is to hinder the salt from being too dry, and it helps to melt it.

NATIONAL GUARD NOTES.

The following opinion from Brig. Gen. Haven of Connecticut on the future of the National Guard and the importance of defining its status will be found of interest at the present time, and will be indorsed generally as a common-sense view of the situation. Gen. Haven says: "The future of our National Guard can only be determined after Congress has taken action in the matter. If the National Guard is to be a sort of reserve to the regular army, and liable for a call to leave the country at any time the President shall deem it necessary, instead of being as intended an organization for the defense of the State, liable to ninety days' service in the United States on call of the President, in accordance with our State laws, it will make a vast difference with the material in its composition. Men of good social position and financial standing compose our National Guard, and are perfectly willing to defend the country in Connecticut or any other State in the Union, but have no desire for foreign service, and could not be induced to join the National Guard if the guard were considered an adjunct of the regular army. In my opinion, with our military departments organized on the exact lines of the army, nothing further would be necessary in the matter of reorganization. We can then have a well-organized, compact body of men, ready and willing to serve anywhere in the country for ninety days, at the expiration of which time, judging from our recent experience, the President would have ample time to organize regulars or volunteers for such service as he might deem necessary."

The Board of Officers of the Seventh Regiment have adopted a new field blouse from a design submitted by Regimental Adjutant De Witt C. Falls. It is a handsome garment, cut out of the regulation gray cloth, and resembles the English tunic. The new blouse has a black collar and black cuffs and nine buttons. The several companies of the regiment will be supplied with it also, providing a majority of the members of each company vote to do so. Company F, Capt. Stelle, has decided to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the organization of the company the last week in January. There will be a mess dinner and a smoker, and the veterans have been invited to take part with the active members in the celebration.

Gen. H. S. Hawkins, United States Army, retired, it is expected, will review the Seventy-first Regiment some time in January. He commanded the brigade of which the Seventy-first Regiment was a part at the battle of San Juan, Cuba, during the Spanish war. G. H. Hassell of the Hospital Corps has been appointed Hospital Steward in place of Craft, honorably discharged. Major Marsh, the regimental Surgeon, has received some very complimentary notices in reference to the ambulance purchased from the corps for the English hospital ship Maine. Sergt. D. Wilson, Quartermaster Sergt. Goldberg, and Corp. Schwab, recently appointed, have passed the examining board. Private King of Company D is an expert bicycle rider, and the way he manoeuvres around the armory after drills is making some of the other riders feel rather anxious for their laurels in the Spring games. Company H will shortly arrange an entertainment. Col. Greene has sent a complimentary letter to the Board of Officers, in which he congratulates them on their selection of commanding officer and predicts a bright future for the regiment. The challenge from the Twenty-fourth Separate Company of Middletown to a game of basketball has been accepted, and matches will be played in February and March next at the Seventy-first Regiment armory. The regimental team will later visit Middletown to play two games there. Corp. Tindale, Sergt. Mackey, and Corp. O'Dell have been appointed a committee to promote basketball interest. Lieut. Gallagher and Privates Morris and Turner are the committee from the regimental athletic association to look out for the interests of the indoor baseball team.

The election for Lieutenant Colonel and Major will be held on Friday, Jan. 5. Capt. W. B. Hazen is the candidate for Lieutenant Colonel and Capt. W. F. Linson the candidate for Major.

Both the Eighth and Twelfth Regiments made a highly creditable showing at the review held in their respective armories last Thursday night. The Eighth was reviewed by Major Gen. Roe and paraded ten commands of sixteen files divided into two battalions, the first being in command of Major Kirby and the second in command of Major Edward, Col. Jarvis being in command of the regiment. Lieut. Col. Ridabock was in command during "evening parade," and during the latter ceremony medals for long and faithful service were presented to the members of the regiment, according to the list given in this column last Sunday. With the Sportsmen on Land and Water.

The open season on black and gray squirrels, which ended in this State on the 15th, was of five days' shorter duration in New Jersey.

This placed a hunter near the boundary line in a rather peculiar position.

A squirrel might be on one limb of a tree, where, if shot, a misdemeanor was committed, while if the gunner waited until his game ran around to an opposite branch he might bring it down with a clear conscience.

This is cutting things pretty fine, but it is the sort of situation that is brought about by variations in the game laws of adjoining States.

Squirrel hunters, who believe in giving their quarry rather more than a fair chance, have of late been discarding the shotgun in favor of the rifle

There is a certain satisfaction in dropping one's victim neatly with a single ball that the manipulator of the "scatter gun" never experiences.

The mere quantity of the bag is what weighs least of all with your true sportsman; the main pleasure is derived from the consciousness of having secured his game in a clean-cut way, and of having been successful in a difficult shot.

Speaking of squirrels, it is not generally known that a few may be found in the woods that run along the Jersey shore of the Hudson, under the foot of the Palisades, but such is the case, and the sharp-eyed and light-footed hunter may even run across a rabbit or two, or, if he be particularly fortunate, he may see a woodchuck, but this latter is too good to count upon.

The best two ways of reaching this territory are by taking the Alpine ferryboat at Yonkers and working one's way south along the shore and through the woods, or by hiring a skiff from "Jim," the bridge signal man at Spuyten Duyvil, and rowing across and up stream beyond the soap-boiling establishment—the odor will identify it—and, leaving the boat in charge of the fisherman, whose cabin is near the old canal boat, pushing north along the woodpath that runs parallel to the shore.

For the party that wants to spend the Summer in an out-of-the-way, quiet spot, and enjoy boating, bathing, and fishing at small expense, the houseboat is about the nicest thing that ever happened.

By "houseboat" I don't mean something like Mr. Lorillard's Caiman, or a floating cottage with a half dozen rooms, fitted with upholstery, rugs, and curtains that will get damp and mouldy and require a couple of servants to keep in shape, but a 30 by 12 foot scow, with a house, of two rooms of 10 by 12 and 8 by 12 feet, respectively, and having a 6 by 12 deck at each end.

A craft such as this will give a man and his wife, or a quartet of fellows, a bedroom and a combined dining room and kitchen.

By covering the roof with painted canvas and hoisting an awning over it, the hurricane deck will become the real living room, except in unpleasant weather. Furnished with cheap cots, some crystal steel cooking and table ware, a table, some camp stools, steamer chairs, a blue-flame wickless oil stove, and a small skiff for a tender, one may enjoy all the pleasures of outdoor life with the certainty of a dry roof and a comfortable bed.

Crystal steel has been specified for kitchen ware, as, while much cheaper than agate, it will last just as long when subjected to the hard knocks incident to this kind of living. Tinware is a good thing to leave out of the equipment wherever possible, on account of its rusting propensities. There was a boat of this style and size built down on the Shrewsbury last year at a cost of $350, which the owner would have rented at $75 for the season—June to October, inclusive—$15 per month. She was ceiled with narrow boards of pine, each room had three windows, and there was sufficient storage space under the decks for all necessary provisions. A houseboat of this size is not too unwieldy to be moved moderate distances by means of a long sculling oar over the stern, and makes a very comfortable abode. The wickless oil stoves now on the market are about as powerful as gas, and have done away with the old smoke nuisance, which was produced by climbing of the wick when left unwatched.

For those who prefer something easily moved from place to place, and rather more on the lines of a boat, the hunting launch is about the thing.

They are practically a craft from 25 to 40 feet in length over all, built somewhat on the lines of a Cape Cod catboat, and fitted with a small engine of from five to twelve horse power, utilizing one of the various kinds of liquid fuel. They, of courses, offer nothing like the accommodations of the houseboat, being constructed with a trunk cabin and cockpit aft. Still the absence of a centreboard allows a much more satisfactory arrangement of cabin space than could be obtained in a sailing craft of the same draught, and while the motive power makes them good travelers at a moderate rate of speed, the long forward deck, cabin trunk, and cockpit combing allow them to push their way through seas and weather that would make the ordinary fast-power launch of equal length a very uncomfortable craft.

A craft of this description, 30 feet over all, usually contains a cabin with berths for two, a toilet room, and a little galley, and quite a roomy cockpit. The fuel is carried in a tank under the forward deck and runs aft through a pipe to the engine. The refrigerator is under the cockpit seats, and the water tank under the deck of the overhang aft. With a small boat for a tender a couple of outers could roam along the protected waterways, at their own sweet will, shifting ground as the fishing or shooting became poor, and enjoying themselves generally.

The only drawbacks as compared with the houseboat being the smaller accommodations and the greater cost of construction, running from two to four thousand dollars.

An ideal bit of water on which to spend a Summer with houseboat or canoe is the Shrewsbury of New Jersey. From Spermaceti Cove, inside the Hook, to Pleasure Bay, at the head of navigation, the river offers beautiful scenery and fine sailing. The fishing near the bridge at the Highlands of the Navesink is extremely good, bass, weakfish, blackfish, flounders, perch, and crabs being plentiful in their season. In fishing in the vicinity of the bridge, anchor about fifty feet from that part lying east of the draw and fish against the trestle. Above the bridge, along the western shore, lie beaches at the foot of the wooded bluff of the Highlands, and here are good camp sites for canoeists, while around the point and up the Navesink branch of the river are little coves with wooded shores, off which houseboats find good anchorage. The lower Shrewsbury reminds one very much of the Indian River of Florida, for the strip of sand which lies between the river and the ocean is so narrow that the traveler upon the stream hears the roar of the surf upon the beach, and may often see it breaking over the bulkhead of the railroad that runs along the shore. Further up stream, past Seabright, the river widens into a small lake, and here magnificent small-boat sailing on smooth water may be enjoyed with the tender, for the surrounding country, being low and flat, allows the wind from the ocean fine play, and the sailor gets the benefit of a steady sea breeze without the attendant roughness that accompanies open-water cruises. Above the bridge at Pleasure Bay the main body of the river separates, one arm running up to Branchport and a trifle beyond, while the eastern long branch of the Shrewsbury, from which Long Branch derives its name, runs to the outskirts of that town. In the "season," when the park at Pleasure Bay is lighted in the evening and the open air operas are in progress, the scene from the water makes one think of a Venetian festival, and to the canoeist paddling silently along the illuminated river front listening to the music, or the houseboater, luxuriously reclining on his hurricane deck idly burning tobacco, the feeling comes that it is good to be living, and his only regrets are that he had not discovered the charm of the river before.

The advantage that this bit of water offers lies in the fact that it is easily reached by rail or water from New York.

A line of steamers runs from Pleasure Bay to the Battery, stopping at Seabright, Highlands of the Navesink, and Sandy Hook, allowing one to reach town by 10 A. M., and be aboard one's floating house by 6 in the evening. Trains may be taken at stations which lie all along the river at Branchport, Monmouth Beach, Galilee, Low Moor, Seabright, Rumson Beach, Normandie, Navesink Beach, Highland Beach, and Highlands of Navesink, and supplies may be obtained economically from any of the large New York department stores which have free deliveries at those points. The outers are thus enabled to make trips to and from town, thus enabling many, with whom the Summer is a season of semi-leisure, to live in camp and attend to business for a day or so each week.

"I want a box of 38 cartridges," said a man in a down-town gun store the other day.

"Yes, Sir. What kind?" asked the attendant.

The would-be purchaser regarded the clerk with disgust. "Thirty-eight calibre, I said. How many kinds of them do you keep?"

"Twenty-two kinds," replied the clerk; "38 Smith & Wesson, 38 Merwin & Hulbert, 38 Short, 38 Colt Long, 38 Colt Lightning, 38-40 Marlin, 38 Winchester, 38 Extra Long, 38-45 Bullard, 38—" but the man had fled, leaving a dozen names yet to come.

As a matter of fact, the man who purchases rifle or pistol cartridges nowadays must name not only the calibre and weight of powder needed, but the arm for which it is intended. There are thousands of cartridges sold every year that are, and always were the worst kinds of failure, but for which there is always a steady demand. Many of these are for use in arms no longer made, but the owners of them still shoot them, and the demand for the community is sufficient to compel the cartridge companies to continue to make them. The long list of cartridges made for rifled arms could be reduced by a very heavy percentage without curtailing the number really necessary to all kinds of sport, and, if the manufacturers would enter into an agreement to cease supplying the unnecessary ones, many of the obsolete weapons now in use would be consigned to the junk heap or curio collection and useful arms purchased, much to the benefit of the gun trade and the improvement of the purchaser's shooting.

The manner in which shotguns are advertised in the sportsmen's publications of this country is amazing in the extreme. Pick up any one of them and read the gun announcements.

What do they say? Generally that in a certain match a certain individual was the user of the gun in question and won.

Every shooter knows that the three deciding factors in the matches are the man, the ammunition, and the gun, in the order given. As to relative importance, the matter is about 90 per cent. man, 9½ per cent. ammunition, and the remainder, gun.

The varying ability of powders, especially nitros, to retain their intended force, under different conditons of heat and moisture to which they may be exposed, and the quality of the shells and wadding, cause different brands of cartridges to give different results, but at the present day, when a man may order a gun of any standard make with the stipulation that it put a certain number of shot into a thirty-inch circle at a certain range, all good guns shoot alike. The men who win the advertised match are good shots, and would have attained the same object equally well with any other gun, and no sportsman is ever deceived by the idea that he can do as well by simply shooting a gun of the make so advertised. There is enough individuality in the finish and mechanism of the output of different makers to warrant stress being laid upon their merits in those lines, without resort to the methods used at present, which only cause unholy mirth among shooters in general.

The Christmas cigar purchased by non-tobacco users, while bad in its way, is hardly as trying to the temper of its recipient as the bargain-counter split bamboo which occasionally finds its way among the Yuletide gifts. A very few pulls at the cigar will usually determine its quality, but the only certain judgment of the rod is obtained by actual use, and its failure then generally means the loss of a fish and the reduction of the fisherman to employing a drop line or a sapling for the balance of the day. There is sold every year to an unsuspecting public a lot of absolutely worthless trash of this kind so prettily gotten up that it is a pity that the dealers do not label it "for decorative purposes only," and thus save a large quantity of trouble all around.

If one's means are insufficient to enable the purchase of a split bamboo at a good, fair price from a reliable maker or his agent, it is better far to buy a well-made lancewood. These latter may be obtained for $4 or so, and can be relied upon to wear, handle, and give results so very little inferior to the bamboo that unless one is a good judge of fishing tackle and wants the very best, it is a wiser policy to get the lancewood. A greenheart rod, while rather tougher, is apt to warp and sag, and will never keep its shape as long as the lighter wood. Besides its reliability, the lancewood gives one an abiding peace of mind not always felt by the possessor of the more costly bamboo. He can regard with comparative calmness an accident to it, knowing how little it will cost to replace its broken joint, or, for that matter, the entire rod. Those who have accidentally trodden upon the middle joint of a split bamboo, and subsequently received the bill for a new one, will appreciate the truth of the above.

It is an appalling fact that no tackle case offered for sale by dealers ever fitted a man's outfit.

The nice, small, convenient-looking affair proves too small for some of the articles it was intended to contain, and the purchaser spends considerable of the leisure of the ensuing week in trimming down the ends of floats, shortening snells, and making up his mind as to what portion of his tackle he will leave behind, so as to get the remainder inside the limited space at his disposal.

On the other hand, warned by his previous experience, he may finally buy a small, tin trunk, and congratulate himself that it will surely contain everything now.

It does, but his belongings rattle around in a manner that makes them appear extremely lonesome, and he finds that it is an unwieldly affair to carry around and in the way generally.

A veteran angler of this city, who had survived both of the above experiences, finally sat down and studied the matter seriously.

He came to the conclusion that his large case was too huge anyway, and put it out of the question.

An examination of the smaller affair convinced him that the trouble was not so much due to its lack of capacity as to the partitions being in the wrong place.

The makers had done their best to make a general average of what would be required in the way of compartments, and, like most general averages, it was not a startling success.

The investigating angler laid out his tackle, proceeded to measure each article, made full-size drawings of the compartments necessary to hold them, and then made a drawing of the case necessary to hold the compartments.

These he sent to a metal box maker and received in course of time a case that held everything snugly and conveniently, and was but a trifle larger than the smaller discarded box.

The maker's bill was $1.50 more than the retail price of the box that did not suit.

The moral of this is, that one man's tackle won't fit in another man's case, and that peace of mind is cheap at $1.50.

I went to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, foot of East One Hundred and Second Street, the other day in search of a lost dog. I came away without my dog, but with a respect for that society that had been increased 300 per cent. during my short visit. Back of the office was the room in which dogs and cats were confined during the time in which they awaited redemption or death. On one side were large pens, much resembling small poultry yards, fenced in with board and wire partitions. The floors of these were covered with sawdust, which absorbed all offensive odors, and kept the atmosphere sweet and pure. Most of these pens were pretty well thickly populated with all sorts and conditions of canines, playing, sleeping, or watching for their owners to appear on the scene, or sniffing the odor of the stew that was cooking for their dinner. There was none of the scared, shrinking demeanor exhibited by them that one would naturally expect to find, and they all seemed to be on very good terms with each other. The mercury was way down below freezing out of doors, but the room was heated to a temperature that suited even the cats who were caged across the aisle. The dogs had a contented, well-fed air, many of them poor tramps, for probably the first time in their lives. As I looked over one of the partitions, a handsome Irish setter stood on his hind legs and poked his nose through the bars into my hand. He had collar, chain, and license, and had evidently strayed away. His master, whose license number identified him, had been notified, and would be down later in the day; meanwhile, the dog was being warmed and fed at the expense of the society. The poor homeless waifs, who had no one to claim them, were being treated equally well, and after a few days' delay, in order to give them a fair chance of being taken away, they would be put painlessly to death by gas, after having experienced the only decent treatment and meals that they had ever known. In common with many other dog owners I have always regarded the dog license as a bit of extortion, but having seen what sort of an insurance policy the license issued by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals really is, I am sure that any dog owner who will spend twenty minutes at the shelter would be willing to pay twice the amount asked. There is scarcely a dog lover who has not at some time passed by a poor, starving mongrel shivering in the wind of a Winter's day and felt himself a brute for so doing.

But for the dread that once within his doors the poor cur would be a permanency, he would have carried it to his home and given it a square meal. One may feel safe in doing so now. Take the poor brute home, give him supper and a warm bed; summoned by postal card or telephone the society's ambulance will call and carry the dog to the Shelter, where the kind treatment you have commenced will be continued until he is put painlessly to sleep, dreaming of the good things that his last week has shown him.

The sportsman who spends much time under canvas usually owns his tent, and most of this class are now overhauling them with an eye to next season's comfort and convenience. There is no improvement which may be added to a tent that will pay such interest on capital and labor involved as a canvas floor permanently sewed to the bottom of three sides of the walls. The separate floor and the sod cloth around the edge of the walls is a delusion and an opening through which everything from the gore seeking mosquito to unpleasant draughts may enter, just as one is endeavoring to sleep. With the flooring sewed to three sides and long enough to hook to the front a couple of inches above the ground, one is pretty nearly wind and insect proof. Another advantage of the permanent flooring lies in the fact that by pegging it down first and then erecting the poles over the correct spots one has an evenly pitched tent in much less time than by the old manner of fastening the guy lines before the floor pegs.

Speaking of tent pegs, why does not some tentmaker furnish his output with galvanized iron pins? The pegs sent out with most tents are heavy, square lengths of rough wood of such poor stuff that the least obstruction met in driving reduces them to kindling wood. They are, moreover, so long that after being driven in the earth far enough to hold the walls down the driver is certain of a back-breaking task in order to remove them when shifting camp. In the absence of the metal pins above mentioned, the ash spokes of old carriage wheels are about the best thing out for this purpose. Any carriage repairer will sell them at about 1½ to 3 cents each, and from them may be made a light, smooth, and [illegible] set of easily carried pegs.

A small window, with crossbars of [illegible] vas, covered with mosquito netting [illegible] fitted with an outside canvas shade [illegible] lated from the inside by cords, and [illegible] near the top of the rear wall, will [illegible] ventilation on hot, stuffy days, when [illegible] sun pours down on the roof, or when [illegible] a dozen men are smoking away a [illegible] day in camp.

NOTES OF BASEBALL.

For more than a week nothing has been learned in baseball circles regarding the proposed reduction of the circuit of the National League and American Association to eight clubs. The members of the Circuit Committee [illegible] to their [illegible] out even [illegible] a hint as to what [illegible] ress was [illegible] There is a rumor, however, that the eight-club circuit, comprising New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis, is sure to materialize within the next two weeks, when a special meeting of the League is to be held at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

***

From Washington comes the report that President Young has been instructed to prepare an eight-club schedule and also one calling for ten clubs.

***

The Brooklyn-Baltimore combination is still ready with the statement that [illegible] no intention of blocking any [illegible] that will benefit the game. These two [illegible] now ready to talk business, as it is a [illegible] fact that a ten-club League, if [illegible] refuses to drop out, will mean [illegible] to both Brooklyn and Baltimore. [illegible] Hanlon of Brooklyn admits that a ten-club schedule will prove disastrous to Brooklyn and Baltimore, as both would be cut out of a number of Sunday and good holiday games, and get the worst of the schedule in other ways. There is a great deal of significance in the remark made by a club owner recently. He said that the club that tries to block the path to an eight-club circuit for 1900 will receive very little consideration when the ten-year agreement expires, in 1901, and when there is likely to be a complete reorganization of the National League.

***

Amos Rusie has been heard from in Indianapolis. He has no intention of retiring, but will play ball in New York or any other city if he receives proper consideration in the way of salary. If Ewing takes charge of the New Yorks next season, it is a pretty safe wager that Rusie will play on the Polo Grounds. There is no greater admirer of Rusie in the business than Ewing.

***

Andrew Freedman believes that the League should recognize Adrian Anson, whom he calls the "Grand Old Man" of baseball. It is true that Anson while he was in the game did much to uphold it in the estimation of the public. Anson remained loyal to the League during the Brotherhood fight. Anson was looked upon as the king pin in baseball for years. He and Ewing were two of the most popular players in the League.

***

Tebeau, manager of the St. Louis Club, claims that a reduction of the circuit will enable him to strengthen his team by the acquisition of several good players from the Cleveland Club.

BROOKLYN.

The Largest and in Every Way the Most Complete Store in Brooklyn and the Second Largest in Greater New York.

Silk Supremacy.

65c. for 1,500 yards $1.25 Corded Silks---79c. for 19,000 yards $1.25 to $1.50 New Fancy Silks.

Our Silk Supremacy is so firmly established that we can safely say that every big lot is offered to us first. We make our choice—and then—— Thus it is that we can offer you the first choice of Silks that have been specially designed and just made for the present season; strong, serviceable and beautiful. In fact, the most attractive lot of Silks ever shown in Brooklyn, every yard of which will give you a never ending satisfaction.

It may seem superfluous to speak of the steady advance in the cost of all materials, for everyone "who runs may read" of the fact. But probably Silks have made greater advances than any other merchandise. Even with this fact, we offer these Silks at prices as low and indeed relatively very much lower than the Silks we sold a year ago. But price after all is not the only desideratum in an artistic fabric like Silks. No merchandise today needs a merchant of more skill in the buying or more taste in the choosing. It takes a connoisseur to know the tasteful and fashionable harmony of colors and designs so as to give you the very Silk that is really new and up-to-date. Silks sold at a price seemingly cheap are dear, if they lack the beauty, style and up-to-dateness and durability. The very things you want them for.

Those who have anything to do with the fashions of the day know that our Silks are always famous as having that indefinable something about them called style, and for that very reason have a value that positively excludes any real comparison with the many ordinary Silks offered at what appear to be a very low price.

And yet with all this character and distinctiveness about them, we give you prices that are incomparable. The opening of Our Sale on Tuesday is sure to interest everyone who loves to see the most beautiful fabrics of the season, and here they are in almost limitless quantities and countless varieties. Bayadere, Stripes and Jacquard figures in every imaginable color from white to black.

And 3,000 yards Crepe de Chine, all silk. They have a few imperfections characteristic to these goods. The shades are beautiful for evening wear—all at 79c. instead of $1.25.

New printed India and Foulard Silks coming in every day. New colorings, exclusive designs and lowest prices.

Lower Prices in an Era of Rising Ones.

Men's Goods in Sections B and C. Boys' Goods in Regular Department.

Shakespeare's famous words, "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune," were never truer than in connection with this our floodtide sale of men's and boys' day and night Shirts. There's not a garment offered at this sale whose purchase won't save you almost half the price you pay for it. Garments which, in almost every instance, cannot be made to-day at the prices, and, in fact, in many instances, lower than the cost of the material alone. Had we not arranged for this sale a year ago it would have been impossible in the face of this era of rising prices to even duplicate last year's opportunities, to say nothing of their betterment. The facts speak for themselves.

YOUNG WOMEN'S POLICE HERO.

Miss Barbara Frazie and Miss Jeanette Piroth of Pleasant Plains, Staten Island, will have an exciting tale to tell to their New Year's callers at the home of one of their friends at 45 Weirfield Street, Brooklyn. The story, which might be entitled "Lost in Brooklyn," is one of adventure, in which Miss Frazie and Miss Piroth figure as the heroines, and a gallant police Sergeant as the hero.

The two young women had been invited by their Brooklyn friend to visit her yesterday and remain over to-day to assist her in receiving callers.

What they did not know about Brooklyn would be the making of a remarkably complete guide to the mysteries of the borough. But, fearing nothing, they left Pleasant Plains and in the course of time were landed at the Brooklyn end of the bridge. Then the pa... made an awful discovery—they had forgotten the address of their friend.

The initial ...elocity of our cannon was 510 meters; that ...of the smallest cannon of our enemy was 750 meters. Admiral Dewey, with pencil in hand, noted the thickness of his mantlets and his casements, and knew what energy was required to penetrate them. He also knew exactly the weight of the most powerful projectile of our ships, and by a simple mathematical calculation he arrived at the distance at which he could fight without himself receiving any harm. Thus he ascertained that he could fight at a distance of 2,000 or 3,000 meters with absolute impunity. The situation, therefore, was just this. We were vulnerable to all the projectiles of the enemy, and this the enemy well knew, while he got out of reach of our cannon and remained out of reach all the while."

Admiral Montojo adds:

"In order to give an idea of our miserable situation I may mention that we had only fourteen torpedoes for the defense of 2,000 meters of the range, and that the cable, which we obtained in Hongkong, was only long enough for five torpedoes, and therefore only five torpedoes could be placed."

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Dec. 31.—Philip E. Burroughs, who has been British Vice Consul in Kansas City for nearly six years, has resigned. He intends to go into court Tuesday and become a naturalized citizen of the United States.

"I feel that I should become naturalized, said Mr. Burroughs. "My children are growing up. I never expect to return to England, this is my home, and I shall live and die here. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the institutions of this country, and, though no one here ever doubted my loyalty to my own country, I shall feel thoroughly at home as an American citizen."

Browne had sold other strips of land off the same property on Mrs. Smith's orders, but in those cases she had received the money.

The Government at Berlin has taken steps to demand redress for the seizure of the steamer Bundesrath by a British warship. One Boer shell killed a British Captain and wounded seven Lieutenants at Ladysmith. It is reported that the Boers have driven back a British reconnoitring force. YOUNG WOMEN'S POLICE HERO.

Miss Barbara Frazie and Miss Jeanette Piroth of Pleasant Plains, Staten Island, will have an exciting tale to tell to their New Year's callers at the home of one of their friends at 45 Weirfield Street, Brooklyn. The story, which might be entitled "Lost in Brooklyn," is one of adventure, in which Miss Frazie and Miss Piroth figure as the heroines, and a gallant police Sergeant as the hero.

The two young women had been invited by their Brooklyn friend to visit her yesterday and remain over to-day to assist her in receiving callers.

What they do not know about Brooklyn would be the making of a remarkably complete guide to the mysteries of the borough. But, fearing nothing, they left Pleasant Plains and in the course of time were landed at the Brooklyn end of the bridge. Then the pair made an awful discovery—they had forgotten the address of their friend.

"Let me see, now," said the policeman, when appealed to. "I did know a family by that name used to live out in Canarsie. It's near a road which runs down to the water."

"Oh, but that's not them," chorused the two lost ones. "They live on a street with gas lamps on it."

The policeman gave it up at this. He directed the girls to Police Headquarters.

"What's the lady's name?" asked the Sergeant in charge, with the air of a Sherlock Holmes. "Oh, yes. Certainly. Just wait a minute, please."

The "minute" proved to be an hour, but at the end of it the gallant Sergeant, after many inquiries over the telephone, had succeeded in learning the address wanted, and the two young women, with a tremendous admiration for the police system of Brooklyn, went on their way rejoicing.

FILIPINOS PLAN OUTBREAK

FOREIGN CONSULS IN DANGER

Injury to Them, the Plotters Believed, Would Result in International Complications.

MANILA, Dec. 31.—Four explosive bombs, a few firearms, and 500 rounds of ammunition were discovered in a house in the centre of Manila this morning while the police were seeking Recarte, the insurgent leader, who was said to have come to Manila in the hope of effecting an outbreak yesterday by taking advantage of the mobilization of the American troops at Gen. Lawton's funeral.

To-day it developed that the plot included the throwing of bombs among the foreign Consuls attending the ceremony, in order to bring about international complications. These, it seems, were to have been thrown from the Escolta's high buildings, but the avoidance of the Escolta by the funeral procession spoiled the plan.

The populace, it is thought, had been prepared for the attempt by a rumor, circulated widely among the natives yesterday, that Aguinaldo was in Manila and would personally lead the outbreak. The American authorities, having been advised of what was brewing, prepared for all contingencies.

Capt. Morrison, who commands the troops in the most turbulent district of the city, says he does not believe an actual uprising will ever occur, as the natives lack the resolution to take the first steps in a movement that would entail fighting at close quarters with the American troops.

AMERICAN ADVANCE EXPECTED.

Large Bodies of Insurgents Reported by Native Spies to be Massing Near Imus and Other Places.

MANILA, Dec. 31.—An American advance in Cavite Province, south of Manila, is expected shortly. Reliable reports from native spies show that there are upward of 2,000 organized insurgents under arms within a mile of Imus. They are strengthening their intrenchments, and possess fine modern artillery.

At Novaleta the Filipino intrenchments have been much strengthened since Gen. Schwan's advance. A thousand of the enemy are in that vicinity, and there are 800 at San Francisco de Malabon. From 12 to 100 garrison each of the towns in the southern part of Cavite Province, and the same may be said of the towns in Batangas Province.

The Provinces of North Camarines and South Camarines hold quantities of hemp, which the people cannot market. As a consequence the population in that part of Luzon is suffering from lack of food. Rice now costs four times its normal price.

Reports have been received that 2,000 insurgents are massed at Mount Arayat, having strong positions which command steep and narrow trails, and that they are prepared to roll boulders down upon advancing troops.

LAWTON'S BODY LEAVES MANILA

Transport Thomas Sails, Carrying Also the Remains of Major Logan.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31.—The departure of the transport Thomas from Manila yesterday, with the remains of Major Gen. Henry W. Lawton aboard, was announced in a dispatch received at the War Department from Gen. Otis to-day.

The vessel comes to the United States via Nagasaki. She also has aboard the remains of the late Major John A. Logan.

ERRORS IN THE HEMP FIGURES.

Assistant Secretary Meiklejohn Makes a Correction.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31.—Several days ago Assistant Secretary of War Meiklejohn addressed a letter to Representative Long of Kansas, setting forth what had been done by the War Department toward opening the hemp ports in the Philippine Islands. The letter contained some errors made by the compiler in tabulating the figures. At the request of the department the letter was returned, and yesterday another letter was sent Mr. Long, in which the errors were corrected. The corrected letter in part is as follows:

"Major Gen. Otis, in his annual report, says that for the year ending Aug. 31, 1899, the same quantity of hemp has been taken from the shipping ports during that year as in the preceding year, and that there still remain in the islands considerable quantities of hemp. In this connection it should be stated that the shipping ports above mentioned are Manila, Iloilo, and Cebu, no other ports being opened.

"The date of occupation of the Port of Manila was Aug. 13 1898; of Iloilo, Feb. 15, 1899, and of Cebu, Feb. 25, 1899, since which dates these ports have been open.

"The estimated exports of hemp from the Philippine Islands for the one year of American occupation will approximate 93,000 tons, of which amount 29,000 tons should be credited to the United States, and 64,000 tons to other countries.

"This places the estimated exports of hemp to the United States for one year of American occupation at about 17,000 tons less than the exports of 1897. This is accounted for by the fact that there have been opened for shipment only three ports of the Philippine Islands."

TO RESUME TRADE TO-DAY.

$2,000,000 Worth of Tobacco Ready for Shipment to Manila.

MANILA, Dec. 31.—Life along the coasts of the Provinces of Cagayan and North and South Ilocos is resuming normal conditions. The American troops occupy the important towns and patrol the country roads. The natives implore the Americans to continue the occupation, to establish a settled Government, and to terminate the uncertainty, abuses and confiscations that have characterized the rule of the Tagalog revolutionists during the last eighteen months.

Large amounts of tobacco, estimated to be worth $2,000,000, are ready for shipment to Manila. The opening of the ports of Dagupan, San Fernando, Vigan, Laoag, and Aparri to-morrow will permit the resumption of trade, bringing relief to communities greatly in need of foodstuffs. Many vessels have already cleared from Manila for these ports.

SPANISH PRISONERS ALL FREE?

Release Ordered by Aguinaldo, It Is Said—Gillmore's Whereabouts.

MANILA, Dec. 31. — Incoming Spanish prisoners declare that Aguinaldo has ordered the release of all Spaniards now in possession of the rebels.

The mountain passes of Cagayan and the two Ilocos provinces are still guarded, in the hope of catching the insurgent General, Tinio, who is still a fugitive. It is asserted that Lieut. Gillmore is in Tinio's custody.

Sick from Bachelor's Command.

MANILA, Dec. 31.—Sixty-eight sick out of Major Bachelor's command of 120 are coming to Manila.

Gen. Tirano in Grief.

MANILA, Dec. 31.—The transport Zafiro has arrived at Manila, bringing Gen. Tirano, who is much grieved at being supplanted by Col. Hood as Military Governor of Cagayan Province. He hesitates to land, because he looks upon Manila as a nest of insurgents, who may assassinate him because he surrendered Cagayan. He says that when Col. Hood arrived the Presidents of all the towns in the province repaired to Aparri and begged him to continue them in their positions, saying also that the natives desired to be rid of the presence of the Macabebees, the friars, and the colored American soldiers, toward whom they entertained a violent antipathy.

MONTOJO EXPLAINS HIS DEFEAT.

Blames It on Dewey for Refusing to Come Within Range.

CHICAGO, Dec. 31.—The Tribune to-day prints the text of Admiral Montojo's defense under court-martial proceedings for his defeat at Manila. The bulk of the blame is charged by the Admiral not to himself or his fleet, but to the Spanish Government for its unprepared conditions. He also claims that Admiral Dewey kept out of range of the Spanish guns—a proceeding which Montojo refers to as "a retreat."

Montojo says:

"The only preparation that had been made for war was made by the Americans, who were businesslike, and arranged everything with pencil and paper. The initial velocity of our cannon was 510 meters; that of the smallest cannon of our enemy was 750 meters. Admiral Dewey, with pencil in hand, noted the thickness of his mantlets and his casements, and knew what energy was required to penetrate them. He also knew exactly the weight of the most powerful projectile of our ships, and by a simple mathematical calculation he arrived at the distance at which he could fight without himself receiving any harm. Thus he ascertained that he could fight at a distance of 2,000 or 3,000 meters with absolute impunity. The situation, therefore, was just this. We were vulnerable to all the projectiles of the enemy, and this the enemy well knew, while he got out of reach of our cannon and remained out of reach all the while."

Admiral Montojo adds:

"In order to give an idea of our miserable situation I may mention that we had only fourteen torpedoes for the defense of 2,000 meters of space, and that the cable, which we obtained in Hongkong, was only long enough for five torpedoes, and therefore only five torpedoes could be placed."

TALKS ON THE PHILIPPINES.

Former Signal Corps Men Speak at the Ninth Regiment Armory.

The Sunday afternoon patriotic services in the Ninth Regiment Armory were continued yesterday by the Rev. Dr. Madison C. Peters, the Chaplain of the regiment. Talks by Chaplain Wilson of the Fourteenth Regiment and Fritz Andreae and William H. Reeves, Jr., former members of the United States Signal Corps, were the features of yesterday's services.

Mr. Andreae and Mr. Reeves talked of their experiences in the Philippines. The former said that he was in charge of the photographic department of the corps in Luzon. He described the efforts of himself and his comrades in getting pictures of the Philippines fortifications and intrenchments in that island. He said that they were discovered once and arrested. In speaking of the treatment he had received while under arrest, Mr. Andreae said that it was much kind and considerate. He said that both he and his comrades had every possible chance to prove that they were not spies. As to the people, Mr. Andreae said many of them were educated, courteous, and hospitable. This was especially true of the officials, many of whom were college-bred men.

Mr. Reeves gave a description of the City of Manila and its inhabitants. He said that the first thing that struck the American upon his arrival in Manila was the big wall that surrounds the city. The next thing was the size and biting qualities of the mosquitoes. The natives, said Mr. Reeves, are a happy-go-lucky people, not overfond of work, pleasant and courteous. One of their chief characteristics, he said, was their ability to see a business opening and drive a bargain. Many of the American soldiers, he said, were the victims of native bargaining.

The street-car service in Manila, Mr. Reeves declared, was even worse than the Brooklyn Rapid Transit. He said that the cars were small, old, and were drawn by small ponies. Frequently when the cars became stalled, the passengers were asked to get out and push the car along for a distance. The people of Manila, according to Mr. Reeves, are excellent musicians.

Dr. Peters announced that next Sunday afternoon special services in memory of Gen. Lawton would be held at the armory.

LEO SUGGESTS HIS SUCCESSOR.

The Pope Is Said to Have Designated Cardinal Girolamo Maria Gotti for the Honor.

ROME, Dec. 31.—It is asserted that the Pope, after the recent ceremony of opening the holy door at St. Peter's Cathedral, addressed his intimate entourage and said:

"I thank Divine Providence for granting me the grace of being able to celebrate this great function, and I wish for my successor grandeur and a long reign, to the greater glory of God.

"My successor will be young as compared with my own age, and will have time to see many glories of the Papacy and the Church."

Later the Pope clearly designated Cardinal Girolamo Maria Gotti, Prefect of the Congregation of Indulgences and Sacred Relics, as his successor. Cardinal Gotti, the famous Genoese monk, is a man of great piety and modesty. Now about sixty-four years of age, he has always lived the life of an ascetic, despite the dignity of a Prince of the Church, he always sleeps in a cell and on a hard mattress.

BRITON TO BECOME AMERICAN.

Vice Consul at Kansas City to be Naturalized There.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Dec. 31.—Philip E. Burroughs, who has been British Vice Consul in Kansas City for nearly six years, has resigned. He intends to go into court Tuesday and become a naturalized citizen of the United States.

"I feel that I should become naturalized, said Mr. Burroughs. "My children are growing up, I never expect to return to England, this is my home, and I shall live and die here. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the institutions of this country, and, though no one here ever doubted my loyalty to my own country, I shall feel thoroughly at home as an American citizen."

DISAGREE OVER A DIAGNOSIS.

Each Set of Doctors Is Backed by a State Board of Health.

ELIZABETH, N. J., Dec. 31.—A lively meeting of the Board of Health is expected on Tuesday night, when Drs. Green and Quinn will report that a girl seventeen years of age named Houston living on Third Street has diphtheria. They will be backed up by the State Board of Health, who made an analysis of the culture of the throat and agreed with the doctors.

Drs. Donovan, Marvlag, Reilly, and Stern, who saw the patient, are equally positive that the girl has not diphtheria. They are supported by an analysis of the New York State Board of Health and the professors of the Carnegie Laboratory. All the doctors in the controversy are members of the Union County Medical Board, and there is no little feeling over the matter.

SNEAK THIEVES GET $3,200.

CHICAGO, Dec. 31.—Sneak thieves entered the boarding house of Mrs. Alice Stuart on Michigan Avenue to-night while the members of the household were at dinner and carried away jewelry, diamonds, and other property valued at more than $1,200. The stolen property belonged to members of Charles Frohman's company, which is playing "The Girl From Maxim's" at a local theatre. The losers are Miss Josephine Hall, the star of the company; Miss Gertrude Whitty, and Robert Hickman, the stage manager.

About the same hour porch climbers entered the residence of Robert Lindblom of the Civil Service Board and stole cash and valuables amounting to over $2,000.

FROZEN TO DEATH IN GEORGIA.

Fate of a Lumber Mill Hand—Six Inches of Snow.

STILLMAN, Ga., Dec. 31.—A young man, who gave his name as Will Morgan and his home as Warren County, was found frozen to death in a house used as a justice court room near here last night. Morgan came here several days ago, and went to work at a lumber mill. He was hurt by a pile of lumber falling on him yesterday morning, and quit work for the day. Later he was found unconscious from the intense cold which prevailed, and shortly afterward died.

MACON, Ga., Dec. 31.—The heaviest snowstorm within the memory of the oldest inhabitants fell here to-day. It is estimated the fall was fully six inches on the level. Much wheat has been planted in this section, and farmers say the snow insures a big crop.

SAVANNAH, Ga., Dec. 31.—Snow and sleet have been falling here all day. The snow began about 8 o'clock this morning and continued at intervals until 2 P. M. Sleet fell all afternoon. Telegraph and telephone wires are ice laden. This is a month earlier than the average snow. It is not believed any damage has resulted.

Detroit Man Frozen to Death.

DETROIT, Dec. 31.—Adolph Hempke, aged thirty-eight, is the first victim of the cold weather in Detroit. He was found frozen to death early to-day just one square from his home. He had been drinking last night and was last seen alive when he started from a saloon in the neighborhood for his home.

Snow in South Carolina.

CHARLESTON, S. C., Dec. 31.—The snow fall to-day was the heaviest in December for thirty years. It began at 11 o'clock and continued until 4, when it turned into an ice storm. Trees were coated with ice two-tenths of an inch thick. The snow is half an inch deep on the level.

Two Philadelphians Frozen.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 31.—John Bellings, aged fifty years, a hostler, froze to death last night while sleeping in a stable on East Columbia Avenue, and Thomas Robinson, aged thirty, met a similar fate in a stable at Clementine and Midvale Streets. The thermometer during the early morning hours registered 8 degrees above zero. Peter Darley, a collector for a commercial house, was overcome by the biting atmosphere, and was found unconscious on the sidewalk. He was sent to a hospital, where several hours' hard work was required to resuscitate him.

Attorney Accused of Fraud.

ROCHESTER, Dec. 31.—C. Wilbur Monroe, a lawyer, was arrested late last night on an order of arrest granted in a civil action to recover $1,050 alleged to have been wrongfully appropriated. The plaintiffs are John Krug and Jacob Flagler, as surety for Krug. It is understood the plaintiffs allege that the money said to be misappropriated was intrusted to Mr. Monroe to carry on certain litigation.

Dewey Going to Savannah.

SAVANNAH, Ga., Dec. 31.—Admiral Dewey has written to the Savannah Reception Committee, which waited on him in Washington six weeks ago that he will be pleased to visit this city on or about March 20. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Dewey.

WAGNER COMPANY MERGED

President Webb's Announcement of Transfer to Pullman Company.

Service Goes On as Before with No Changes Thus Far in the Personnel.

Formal announcement is made by Dr. W. Seward Webb of the transfer to the Pullman Company of the property and business of the Wagner Palace Car Company. The transfer went into effect at noon on Saturday, and Mr. Webb ceased to be President of the Wagner company at that time.

President Webb made formal announcement of the transfer to the employes in the following letter:

"To the Officers and Employes of the Wagner Palace Car Company:

"The Wagner Palace Car Company has to-day transferred its property and business to the Pullman Company, and hereafter you will receive your orders from the latter company.

"I desire to thank you, one and all, not only for myself, but on behalf of the stockholders whom I represent, and also on behalf of the many railroads over which we have operated, for your faithful services during the past fifteen years, which have contributed so much to the prosperity of the Wagner Car Company.

"I trust you will be as faithful and as loyal in the future to the Pullman Company as you have been in the past to the Wagner Palace Car Company."

The service of the company goes on just as before, and as yet no other changes have been made in the personnel of the official staff or force of employes. J. C. Yager, General Manager of the Wagner Company, said yesterday, that he expected to continue with the Pullman Company, which is no longer known as Pullman's Palace Car Company, but simply as the Pullman Company, but in what capacity he did not know. He said it would be the policy, he understood, of the management to take care of as many of the Wagner employes as possible. Of course where each company has representatives in a city, as at Boston and Chicago, the forces will presumably be merged, but he understood that there would be few changes in the force, division and district Superintendents, conductors and trainmen being quite generally retained.

PROPERTY OWNERS SUED.

Mrs. Sarah M. Smith Says Her Name Was Forged to Deeds.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 31.—Vice Chancellor Emery will hear argument on Tuesday in an action brought by Mrs. Sarah M. Smith of New York, the widow of Andrew J. Smith, against several property owners of Ridgewood, Bergen County. They have built residences on land formerly owned by the complainant, which was sold by H. Huffman Browne, a lawyer, who acted as her agent, but, it is alleged, embezzled the money received for the land and forged the complainant's name to the deeds.

The defendants in the present case are Charles I. E. Masten and Thomas W. White. Each of the defendants purchased land to the value of between $2,000 and $4,000 from Browne and have built handsome residences thereon. It is to have the transfer of these deeds set aside that Mrs. Smith has brought suit.

There are others who purchased part of the Smith land, who also may be brought into court. They are Henry Williams, a man named Winslow and another named Dunham, both of whom are supposed to be myths, and John Edsole. Edsole subsequently sold his land to Mrs. Agnes Wallace Villa, an actress.

According to Mrs. Smith, the above-named pieces of land were sold without her knowledge, her signature to the deeds was forged, and the money received from the sale by Browne never turned over to her. Browne had sold other strips of land off the same property on Mrs. Smith's orders, but in those cases she had received the money.

When the case was heard in Jersey City some time ago Browne declined to answer any questions on the ground that he might incriminate himself. He was sustained in this by Vice Chancellor Emery. As the property transfers were made in New York, Browne is not liable to criminal indictment in New Jersey.

KENTUCKY MAYOR FROZEN UP.

Was Helping Fight a Fire—Rescued with Axes.

Special to The New York Times.

BOWLING GREEN, Ky., Dec. 31.—Fire this mornin gdestroyed the City Hall with its records, five stores, and the Elks' lodge room.

The mercury stood near zero and many firemen were frozen to the hose and the ground. Volunteers were called for and many society men returning from a ball relieved the firemen.

Mayor G. E. Townsend took a nozzle, and while on duty was separated from his comrades by a falling wall. The hose burst and he was deluged by water, which froze almost instantly, and a mass of ice formed about him from head to foot.

Five men with axes chopped him out just in time to save him from freezing to death.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES

Modus Vivendi with France Has Expired—Complications Feared.

ST. JOHN'S, N. F., Dec. 31.—Grave complications are feared between Great Britain and France over the expiration of the Newfoundland fisheries modus vivendi to-day.

The Colonial Legislature cannot meet for several weeks, and the British Parliament is also closed, so that there is no possibility of prompt legislation to remedy the defect. France thus is made able to provoke much trouble with the Colonial Office, and it is feared she will do so.

FOUND DEAD IN SLEEPING CAR.

L. G. Baker of Yarmouth (N. S.) Expires After Leaving New York.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Dec. 31.—Loren E. Baker, President of the Yarmouth Steamship Company, was found dead in his berth in the sleeping car attached to the midnight express on the New York and New Haven road, which left New York on Saturday night at 12 o'clock, upon its arrival in this city Sunday morning.

He was discovered by the porter, who notified the conductor, and a hurry call was sent to the Emergency Hospital. The physicians took him to the hospital and endeavored to revive him. After working some time they pronounced the man dead.

His body was removed to the warerooms of Undertaker Jones, on Lagrange Street. Acting Superintendent of Police Joseph R. Burrell was notified, and he at once notified the officials of the company. Preparations were made for the care of the body of Mr. Baker.

Mr. Baker lived in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and his body will be taken there for burial. He was on his way home from New York, and it is thought that he was stricken with apoplexy during the night. He boarded the train at 11:40 and retired soon after leaving the Grand Central Station in New York.

CASH FOR CHICAGO UNIVERSITY.

Some Handsome Gifts to be Announced on Tuesday.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 31.—The University of Chicago will begin the new year with a largely increased bank account. Some handsome gifts are to be announced at the coming convention, when President Harper will report the financial condition of the university for the first time since April last.

Though definite announcement of new gifts will not be made until Tuesday, it was admitted at the university that some had already been pledged. They are for special purposes, and their nature is being carefully guarded. At least two or three buildings will be built with the money secured.

The money for these improvements comes from friends of the university in and near Chicago. President Harper has devoted considerable time in interesting local men of wealth in the institution, bearing the name of the city, and has succeeded in getting some substantial results. The money will also apply on the gift of John D. Rockefeller, who agreed to duplicate any gift not exceeding $2,000,000.

QUITS THE CHICAGO ORCHESTRA.

Miss Anna Millar Resigns the Post of Manager.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 31.—Miss Anna Millar, after directing the affairs of the Chicago Orchestra for five years, has resigned. Miss Millar's communication resigning her post was as follows:

"I beg with regret to hand in my resignation as manager of the business affairs of the Chicago Orchestra and to ask that it be accepted without delay. My own business anxieties and the work of the orchestra have strained my health greatly, and my physician urges immediate relief and rest.

"It will afford me great pleasure to do everything in my power to expedite the necessary changes."

CRICKET IN ONE OF HIS EARS.

Made a New Jersey Man Deaf and Nearly Drove Him Crazy.

FLEMINGTON, N. J., Dec. 31.—Charles Blazier of High Bridge, who has been practically deaf for six months and recently so deaf he could not hear a gun fired, has recovered his hearing.

Blazier lay down on the grass under a tree last Summer, and went to sleep. He felt a buzzing in his ear when he arose, and within a short time was almost insane. He said there were noises in his head as if a boiler factory, several country bands, and many horse fiddles were trying to outdo each other. He claimed the noises were in his brain. For almost two weeks this kept up. Blazier could not sleep, nor could he remain quiet during this time.

The noises stopped at last, but he found he could not hear out of the right ear, and later the left one also failed him. He at first could hear indistinctly, but later this also failed. The doctors could not fathom the case. The fact that Blazier had insisted that the noises were in his head threw them off.

Dr. M. D. Knight a few days ago determined to investigate the ears. After some trouble the doctor located a foreign substance and removed it. It proved to be the remains of a cricket. Within a short time after the cricket was taken out Blazier began to improve, and now, after the lapse of a couple of days, he can hear almost as well as ever.

GAMBLERS EAT GAMECOCKS.

Ice-Bound and Forced to Feast on Their Fighting Chickens.

Special to The New York Times.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., Dec. 31.—Forty gamblers, with 100 game cocks, left by boat Christmas Day for an isolated spot, ten miles below Knoxville, where a gigantic fighting main had been arranged. But the boat got stuck on a sand bar before reaching its destination and it had no lifeboats.

Fights were held on board, but when the three days' food supply was exhausted the men grew desperate. No one would venture to swim through the floating ice to land, and most of the game birds were killed to prevent starvation. No noise made could arouse the inhabitants of the nearest farmhouse, one mile away.

To-day a hunter passing near the boat was induced to seek assistance, and the men were rescued, returning to the city in carriages to-night.

Two Yonkers Men Asphyxiated.

YONKERS, N. Y., Dec. 31.—Patrick Ryan, sixty-five years of age, a laborer, and John Stembel, twenty-four years of age, a carpenter, both in the employ of the Hebrew Home for Aged and Infirm on Riverdale Avenue, this city, were found dead in their bedroom over the stable this morning. The tube connecting the gas stove with the pipe had become disconnected and they had been asphyxiated.

Gallinger and the Grand Jury.

CONCORD, N. H., Dec. 31.—The presentation before the Federal Grand Jury of the charges against United States Senator Gallinger, alleging violation of the Civil Service law, probably will be brought to a close with little delay to-morrow, as the one witness most desired to complete the case in its present stage, John H. Walker of Washington, D. C., secretary to Senator Gallinger, is here, at the personal request of the Senator.

...EAR WELCOMED

...m Amid the Din of Tin Horns and the Chiming of Bells.

...OUSANDS AROUND TRINITY

...rry Peal of the Old Church's Chimes Drowned in the Bedlam of Discordant Noise.

...igh carnival, with the tin horn at its greatest altitude of evolution, ushered in ... year which ends the nineteenth cen... The numerous progeny of Father ...ickerbocker had not forgotten the time-...ored custom which takes the reverent ...d irreverent alike down into the old city ...here Trinity rears its stately pile and ...eaceful spire, and the crowd, youth and ...age alike, remembered, too, the usages ... and custom have sanctioned, if not ...allowed, by which the atrocious tin horn ...ilds the most conspicuous part in the pro-...gramme.

It would be futile to estimate the size of ... crowd which made the festivities of ...coming this new year of grace into being ...memorable. For certainly not in many years ...has such an outpouring of the people found ...its way to Lower Broadway on a New ...Year's Eve.

The southward trend began early in the ...evening, as the elevated trains and surface ...cars attested, but it was not until after ...9 o'clock that the festive horn began to ...make itself uncomfortably present.

From that time on both sides of the ...street in New York's main artery in the ...lower part of the city presented an ap...parently unending stream of humanity, all ...bound the same way, and the cable cars ...were crowded.

A stranger to the city and its customs ...would not have had difficulty in finding the ...crowd's destination.

The jam in front of Trinity Church made ...the thoroughfare wellnigh impassable. The ...crowd overflowed from Broadway into the ...side streets.

Not only the sidewalks, but the roadways ...and stoops and porticos of the big busi...ness buildings were filled. Horn-armed ...youths packed the streets surrounding the ...Trinity burying ground, and Pine Street ...was hardly less packed, and the crowd ...overflowed into Wall Street as far down as ...the Sub-Treasury Building, and covered its ...imposing steps.

Old bugles, toy crickets of various sizes ...and noise producing effectiveness had been ...called into play, but their parts were lost ...in the everlasting and earsplitting din of ...the horns. These horns were of the re...cently introduced type. They have a double ...noise, according as they are blown hard ...or softly. Most of the army which pos...sessed them last night were not weak ...lunged, and the coarser sound was the ...most popular, if one could judge from re...sults.

Marching bands were formed, which grew ...without effort on the part of the leaders, ...and in unison such a noise was produced as ...might have made the roseate proboscis of the ...famed Anthony the Trumpeter green with ...envy or take on a deeper hue from pure mor...tification if it did not, indeed, disturb the ...serenity of his snoreless sleep of two centu...ries. Perhaps Father Knickerbocker was ...proud of his children. If he was not, it may ...be attributed to his venerable years.

The crowd had reached its height when, as ...the gilded hands of Old Trinity's clock made ...the time 11:30 P. M., the chimes, which ...have rung out and in so many years, pealed ...forth their joyous salutation to the ap...proaching stranger. But chimes were im...possible, and no one would have known ...just what the bells were trying to say ...were it not for an occasional note or two ...which proclaimed some familiar tune like ..."Old Hundred," "America," or "Yankee ...Doodle."

Before "Home, Sweet Home" was rung, ...the sudden entry into the medley plus bed...lam of sound of hoarse notes from the river ...fronts startled the distraught atmosphere. ...That sounded the midnight hour, for the ma...rine contingent starts on time. It was a ...more dignified diapason that the steam ...whistles gave, albeit the tugs lent their ...shrill whistles to the refrain, while the man ...at the siren of the fireboat at the Battery ...became so enraptured with his theme that ...he almost managed a tune on the shrill ...thing.

Now and again some celebrator, mistaking ...the chill breeze of the night for that balmy ...breeze in the lap of which sit the Spring ...and the middle Summer, gave a Fourth of ...July tinge to the occasion by exploding a ...giant cracker, and others added the sharp ...crack of the revolver.

Though some there were who found de...light in shirking either side of the narrow ...passages maintained by the police, and ...emptying the tones of their horns into both ...ears at once of the passers-by, and others ...who had begun their celebration a little too ...early, and with liquid condiment, it was, ...on the whole, the usual merrymaking New ...York crowd.

It made no complaint when after the new ...year arrived it found walking easier than ...hanging on the car platforms, and it dis...creetly disposed itself through the greatest ...possible number of the up and down thor...oughfares in its search for the paths of ...least resistance in the home-going journey.

The night was one which struck one as ...cold on leaving a fireside, but to the pedes...trian it was a comfortable temperature. The ...sky was overcast, and it was only an occa...sional star that dimly blinked through to ...see the sights in Gotham.

During the chiming of "Auld Lang ...Syne" Conrad Metz of One Hundred and ...Sixty-ninth Street and Union Avenue, who ...stood in the crowd directly in front of the ...church, lost a diamond pin valued at sev...eral hundred dollars. Edgar T. Early of ...1,238 Tinton Avenue, who was with him, ...had seen a man take the pin from Metz's ...shirtfront, and grappled with him at once. ...Policeman John Daly of the West Thirtieth ...Street Station arrested the alleged thief, ...and he was locked up in the Church Street ...Station, where he gave the name of John ...Connors, a boilermaker of 44 Greenwich ...Street. The pin was not found.

TREAT FOR MANY HOMELESS MEN.

More than 400 homeless men were treated to sandwiches and coffee and a night's lodging last night at the Bowery Mission. The regular meeting in the early part of the evening consisted of a watch night service, which lasted until midnight. The audience increased as the evening wore on, and by 11 o'clock the rooms were crowded, many having to stand.

Twenty members of the league were appointed to speak personally to each man present. After they had gone among them about 100 men arose in their places and signified their wish for conversion.

As the hands of the clock pointed to 12, a large gong in the organ sounded twelve times and the organ broke out into the "Prayer of Lohengrin" from "Tannhäuser." Then the organ played "Praise God, From Whom All Blessings Flow," and the room shook with the sounds of the men's voices.

The women passed around sandwiches and coffee, which the men eagerly partook of. Some of the men said it was the first meal they had had that day.

According to arrangements previously made with the lodging houses in the neighborhood, all of the men who were without homes were taken care of. They marched in laughing groups to the rooms provided for them, many of them singing Gospel hymns, while others were joined by crowds of urchins blowing tin horns in honor of New Year's Eve.

CHIEF DEVERY'S GREETING.

...hief of Police Devery sent to his subor...ates in the department late last night ...ew Year greeting. It was sent down ...he Chief from his house to Police Head...arters, and is as follows:

"To Commanding Officers of All Boroughs: You will convey to the members of your command at the midnight incoming platoon roll call my appreciation and kind wishes for the manner in which they have performed the arduous duties allotted to them during the past year, and which they successfully coped with on all occasions when called upon to perform their duty.

"But, knowing full well that all the members of the department stand ready at all times, both day and night, to obey the orders of their superiors and to protect the lives and property and all interests appertaining to the citizens of the City of New York, I take the liberty on this occasion to thank the rank and file, and also the commanding officers, for their conduct during the past year, and to wish them all a happy New Year and many returns of the same."

This is the first instance, it was said last night, in which a Chief of Police here had thus remembered his men.

THE McAULEY MISSION SERVICES.

"Watch" services were held last night at the Jerry McAuley Mission, 316 Water Street, until midnight. The three hundred men and women who gathered there gave undivided attention to the "experience" recitations of those who were disposed to relate their manner of conversion.

"Jerry" Griffin, who was converted just fourteen years ago yesterday, when Jerry McAuley was himself at the head of the mission, told what kind of a man he had been and how hard it was at first to bring himself into the fold. Hymns were sung, and prayers offered by S. H. Hadley, the Superintendent of the mission, and Mrs. Emma Whittemore.

A whole family, consisting of father, mother, and their two grown children, will celebrate to-day the anniversary of their being taken into the mission and converted. The father was converted six years ago, the mother and daughter four years ago, and the son, who is about twenty years of age, celebrates his second year.

LIEDERKRANZ WELCOMES 1900.

Impersonations and Warnings to Eschew Errors of the Past.

The German Liederkranz welcomed the new year and bade farewell to the old with unique ceremonies last night in the clubhouse at 111-119 East Fifty-eighth Street.

President Julius May and Mrs. C. M. Boscowitz, whose husband was Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, at 11:30 o'clock led the grand march of five hundred members and guests to the basement. This was dimly lighted with candles stuck in bottles, hollowed carrots and potatoes.

The dim light was to typify the dying year. When all were seated, scores of the handsomest boys the American District Telegraph could muster, all in bright uniforms, entered and handed each guest his wine card. This contained a series of cartoons showing every stage of the New Year drunkard's progress.

When all had ordered wine a curtain was drawn on an improvised stage and there stood revealed an old-fashioned German "Nachtwaechter," who announced the ending of the year. The part was well impersonated by C. M. Boscowitz. He gave the members a lecture on their sins of the closing year, and just before the twelfth stroke of the clock he vanished into darkness.

With the last stroke of the clock an electric circuit was completed and the hall was lighted as if by magic with a thousand electric lights. At the same time there appeared on the stage Miss Loupet Arcularius, a hadsome maiden, in a charming gown, as the New Year. She was royally welcomed.

She besought the assembled persons to eschew all their faults, and to make the year one of good deeds. When she had concluded Chairman Boscowitz and his four fellow-members of the committee, made up as tramps of the most abandoned type, took the stage, and began to sing the list of wines from the menue, all arranged to rhyme.

Following this there was a distribution of souvenirs, each woman receiving a silver spoon, an engraved calendar, and the menu card with the music of the song as sung by the tramps.

Married With the New Year.

William J. Witt of 219 West One Hundred and Fifteenth Street and Anna Waddilove of 71 North Street, Jersey City, were married at Liederkranz Hall, Jersey City, one minute after midnight last night by the Rev. Rufus Johnson, pastor of Trinity Baptist Church. The couple selected that time for the ceremony because they believe the twentieth century begins to-day and they desired to be the first couple married in the new century. Emma Waddilove was bridesmaid and Oscar Gahagan was best man. The bride and bridegroom are each twenty-two years old.

Throngs About Grace Church.

A crowd of about ten thousand persons gathered last night in Broadway and the adjacent streets to hear the chimes of Grace Church. If they had not made such a terrific din with as many tin horns, cow bells, and with the aid of strong lungs the magnificent programme of twenty numbers played by Miss Bertha Thomas would have been better appreciated. As it was, much of the effect was lost, except for the last numbers, which were heard to better advantage, as the crowd from sheer exhaustion gave up its clamor.

St. Andrew's New Seguin Chimes.

The thousands who gathered in and around St. Andrew's Church, Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Street, last night to hear the splendid new Seguin chimes recently installed in that church, were well repaid. The programme was performed by J. Grant Senia and began at 11:45 P. M.

THE NEW YEAR AT BERLIN.

Grand Midnight Reception by the Emperor—Religious Service in the Castle.

BERLIN, Jan. 1.—Amid the tolling of church bells and cheers rising from scores of thousands of throats in the dense multitude of joyous people who crowded the streets down town, the New Year—and the new century, as the Germans elect to consider it—came in.

Simultaneously the booming of thirty-three gunshots of salutation sounded from the Lustgarten, near the castle, where Emperor William and the Empress were receiving enthusiastic homage from the representatives of a loyal nation.

From the roof of the City Hall a score of trumpeters played chorals, Roman candles lighting up the darkness all around.

The Court reception was a most impressive spectacle. It was preceded by divine service in the chapel of the castle, in which their Majesties, the Princes of the royal household, the Ambassadors, Ministers, and high dignitaries joined.

The sermon was on the momentousness of the hour, the preacher giving thanks for the blessings of the closing century, and for those promised by the century about to begin.

At the termination of the service the worshippers proceeded to the gorgeous White Hall of the castle, which was illuminated like fairyland and decorated with symbols typifying a bright future.

When their majesties entered a corps of trumpeters, blowing silver instruments, intoned an inspiring march, during which a procession was formed with the assistance of the Chief Court Marshal Count von Eulenberg and numerous young pages in bright costumes of scarlet and silver.

The view from the gallery was magnificent. Several thousand guests had been bidden, comprising the flower of Germany, and the gala uniforms and decorations, with the gorgeous costumes of the women, made up a brilliant scene.

Empress Augusta Victoria wore a sage-green moire antique gown, with a train of ten yards of pink velvet, borne by eight pages. She wore also the historical diamond necklace once owned by Peter the Great.

Emperor William wore the Guard regimentals, the decoration of the Order of the Black Eagle, and an orange scarf. After taking his seat upon the throne, he reviewed the procession, which filed rapidly past. It was remarked that he smiled with particular attention upon Count von Bülow and Prince Hohenlohe.

The ceremony differed in no important respect from the ceremonies of former years.

Quite contrary to the general expectation, Ambassador White and Mrs. White followed the Spanish Ambassador, Señor Don Mendez de Vigo.

After the reception the Emperor held a brief cercle, but said little. The entire function lasted not more than forty minutes. It was remarked that his Majesty did not seem in his usual lively mood, while the Empress was in excellent spirits. He addressed, however, a few pleasant words to Mr. and Mrs. White, as did also the Empress.

Cuban Brigadier Is Killed.

HAVANA, Dec. 31.—Dionisio Gil, a colored Brigadier General in the Cuban army, was shot and killed last night at Cienfuegos by the police while resisting arrest for a wanton assault on a sanitary inspector. Gil was one of the leaders arrested at Baracoa recently on a charge of attempting to take a filibustering expedition to San Domingo.

THE MARYLAND LEGISLATURE.

Sharp Fight Promised Among the Rival Democrats for the Offices—Prospective Legislation.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 31.—After an interval of twenty-one months the Legislature of Maryland will convene for a ninety-day session at the State House, in Annapolis, at noon of Wednesday of the coming week. The members of both branches will caucus on Tuesday evening at the State House, for the purpose of naming their candidates for the various offices. The Democrats, being largely in the majority, will organize both houses. The leaders of the Democratic forces are backward in selecting their candidates, and beyond a canvass for the presiding officer of each branch, nothing has been done.

Senator Hubner of Baltimore County is slated for the Presidency of the Senate, while Lloyd Wilkinson of Worcester, Secretary of the State Central Committee, appears to have the call for the Speakership of the House. Neither will receive the caucus nomination without a struggle, however. Ferdinand C. Latrobe, eight times Mayor of Baltimore City, and once Speaker of the House, is a strong candidate for presiding officer of the lower branch, and claims to have, besides the eighteen votes of Baltimore City, enough supporters from the country to give him a majority of the sixty-seven caucus votes.

Senators Brothers of Cecil and Boule of Montgomery are candidates for President of the Senate, and probably will have some support.

Some interest is being manifested in the Democratic policy. The leaders insist that every pledge made on the hustings must be fulfilled, and in this they are backed by Gov. Smith.

There is one measure, however, on which the party will probably divide, and that is the bill providing for police reorganization of Baltimore City. The Reform League stands by the original measure framed by the organization, providing for a non-partisan board, whereas Mayor Hayes favors an amendment which would make him a member of the board.

Roger W. Cull, Secretary of the Reform League, will probably make the fight in behalf of the league, while Mayor Hayes will do the fighting on the other side. The bill is undoubtedly the most important to be considered, and, as both parties are committed to its salient features, its passage is assured.

Another measure that will be introduced early in the session is that aimed at corrupt practices. It will be offered by Senator Putzel, Republican, of Baltimore City. This, too, is acceptable to both sides and will therefore become a law.

OHIO'S LAWMAKERS TO MEET.

COLUMBUS, O., Dec. 31.—The General Assembly will meet to-morrow, and will remain in session just long enough to organize by electing the Republican caucus nominees.

Almost the sole topic in legislative and political circles to-day has been the action of the Republican Senate caucus excluding Senator Brown, the Independent Republican of Hamilton County. The action of the Republican Senators is compared with the action of the Republican House caucus which permitted the Independent Republican representatives from Hamilton County to participate.

The action of the Senate caucus was not anticipated, the admittance of the independents to the House caucus having been prearranged, it is now claimed, to injure the nomination of McElroy as Clerk of the House.

ANTI-GOEBELITES HOPEFUL.

FRANKFORT, Ky., Dec. 31.—To-night's trains brought large additions to the crowd of political leaders already here. Among them was Gen. P. Wat Hardin, who opened headquarters and launched his Senatorial boom on an anti-Goebel platform.

With Hardin came ex-Secretary of State Headley and several Senators and Goebel men. It was announced to-night that the Representatives, who are pronounced anti-Goebel members of the Legislature and leaders on that side will hold a conference to-morrow at the same time the Republicans meet. It may be decided to wait until after the Democratic caucus to-morrow night before taking any action on the anti-Goebel slate of candidates for places in the organization of the Legislature.

The anti-Goebel leaders increased the estimate of their strength in the two houses to-night. They now claim to have eight Democrats in the Senate and thirteen in the House, which would give the coalition a majority on joint ballot or would control either House in separate session.

A HALF-CENTURY KEEPSAKE.

Two sweet-faced old sisters—one a bedridden invalid for seven years—keep house together in a cozy little ground floor flat at 136 West Sixty-third Street, where they have a veritable museum of interesting mementoes of the past. They are Miss Anna B. Cornwall and Miss Sara Cornwall, sisters of Henry Bedinger Cornwall, Professor of Chemistry at Princeton University.

Not the least treasured of Miss Anna's possessions is a quaint old needlebook which was never used, but treasured as a keepsake. From its folds as she lay on her bed of sickness last night she drew this newspaper clipping from a New Year's number of a New York newspaper, which when she first put it away in that place as a girl of twelve she determined should be kept there if possible until the present holiday season, when she would again read it and with the realization of passing time compare the feelings it would now evoke with the hopes it then raised in her childish bosom:

"EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY.

"Blessed be the young eyes that shall see its future through of fifty years! Blessed be the ears that shall hear the clock strike the century hour of Nineteen Hundred! Blessed be those who shall ascend that Pisgah's top of time and look back over the pathway of humanity to this hour, and contemplate its great progress points and the events of happy augury and impulse which shall divide the distance, like illuminated milestones along the road. And blessed be the eyes that shall look futureward from that sublime standpoint, and see what God has prepared for human vision within the horizon of that distance [sic] day.

"And many eyes now fixed upon these lines will see that day, and contemplate its past and future, and some of the grey-headed men and women of that epoch may remember these words in connection with this anniversary. For there are thousands of young minds on both sides of the Atlantic who have learned to sympathize with the spirit of the philanthropic movements of the present day.

"The men who had borne the brunt and burden of these movements may be permitted to pass over a little way into the Canaan of the next half century; but, one by one, they will disappear, and the ark of the cause be trasferred to the shoulders of those now in the morning of life. Children of to-day! Fathers of the first men of 1900! God and humanity expect that you will do your duty, and be true to your high trust and vocation."

Miss Anna is cheerful in spite of her affliction, but after she had read it over she said that when she was a girl she had been thought very progressive, but after all she was not sure that progress had accomplished all it promised, and that the old ways did not bring more happiness; "but," she said, "there is nothing original in that. It is the way that nearly all feel, and I suppose the children of 1900 will be saying the same thing when they have seen the end of the next half-century."

The Misses Cornwall are the daughters of the late Rev. Nathaniel Ellsworth Cornwall, who was for nineteen years rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Southport, in the town of Fairfield, Conn., and there it was that the clipping was filed away. The needlebook was a present to Miss Anna from her paternal grandfather on her tenth birthday. Miss Sara is a poetess, and her one volume, "Roses and Myrrh," is now in its third edition. They lived in the stage-coach days in Connecticut and have always been great newspaper readers.

POLICEMAN FALLS WITH HORSE.

Mounted Policeman John F. McKenna of the Central Park squad was standing beside his horse yesterday afternoon in the West Drive at Ninety-sixth Street when the animal became frightened at the barking of a dog and ran away. It was caught at Seventy-ninth Street by Mounted Policeman Fitzgerald.

Before McKenna's horse was caught Mounted Policeman George Schaffner started in pursuit, and while speeding down the bridle road his horse fell, and he was thrown over its head, receiving severe contusions of the chest. He was carried to the sheepfold by his brother officers, where he was attended by Police Surgeon Marsh, and then taken to his home. It is not thought that his injuries are fatal.

HUNGARIAN PEASANT BALL.

Quaint Drama of a Native Village Interests the Spectators, After Which There Is Dancing.

Just as the new year was ushered in Madison Square Garden presented a scene of noise and commotion. It marked the formal beginning of the Hungarian Peasant ball festivities. In the seats and boxes of the Garden fully 8,000 people looked down upon a quaint scene depicted by native costumed peasants in a little Hungarian village that had been erected in the east of the inclosure.

In front of this was what was intended as the village green surrounded by a rustic fence at the far end of which was a huge gate, the entrance to the village.

Around the mock buildings, the church, the Court House, Town Hall, and jail were a hundred or more men and women in the costumes of the native Hungarian, the Slav, the Roumanian, and Servian, stood in picturesque attitude. A New Yorker might have imagined he was viewing a comic opera.

The hour of midnight struck and with it the death of the old year. Suddenly there broke forth from two Hungarian bands stationed in the opposite galleries, the strains of "Auld Lang Syne"; a pistol shot was heard, then a fusillade of shots, reinforced by volleys of cheers. "Happy New Year!" was heard on all sides, and on the floor and up above alike greetings came thick and fast. The Hungarian ball was then considered to be in full swing.

After this the "drama" of a Hungarian village was begun—very similar in picture effect to some Broadway comic opera—the revelers at the tables, the innkeeper and his maids, and then there burst into full view the village maids, the swains and all. Then quickly followed the pretty Magyar Kor, the dances of the Roumanians and Servians, all of which were applauded to the echo by those who looked on. Society was represented in the boxes, and seemed to view the novel scene with much interest.

To carry out the village life the merry-making is interrupted by the sound of a bugle, and a detachment of Hussars, recruiting officers, mounted on horses, appear. They ride around the garden, and with unctuous ceremony file through the big village gate with loud huzzas of welcome. The officers dismount, make love to the maidens, and again the opera feature is carried out to the mind of the modern American.

Young peasants, fired with ambition, become recruits.

Then comes the dedication of the flag. It is presented to the regiment. The military ceremony is brought to a close with the Hungarian anthem, "Isten Ald Meg a Magyart." After this, there being other dances in the meanwhile, the drama closes with the famous dance, "Csárdas."

Then it comes about that the recruits are bundled into a wagon, and the regiment marches off (around the Garden) followed by cheers and adieus of dancing and singing maidens.

The spectators cheered loudly while this was going on, and then the fun of the evening began. Hundreds of people sought the floor, and for the rest of the night danced. The ball was a great success, and yielded a big sum for the purposes of charity to which the officers of the Hungarian Society will devote it.

Among the spectators occupying boxes were Mrs. Burke-Roche and Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs with a party.

THE DANISH WEST INDIA DEAL.

Reported at Copenhagen That Negotiations with the United States Are Nearly Complete.

LONDON, Jan. 1.—The Copenhagen correspondent of The Daily Mail says:

"The sale of the Danish West Indies to the United States bids fair to be accomplished. The Danish Capt. Christmas, who has influential connections in the United States, and who has secured the support of President McKinley, Admiral Dewey, and a number of influential American Senators, is acting as intermediary between the two Governments, direct official communication being impossible for Denmark after repeated failures in previous attempts.

"For several days an attaché of one of the principal United States Embassies has been here, having long interviews with the Danish Minister of Finance, Dr. Hoerring, and this week Capt. Christmas will go to Washington to assist the publication of America's official offer. No opposition is expected from King Christian. The price has been fixed at $4,000,000."

DISORDER ON FERRYBOAT.

A crowd of young men created a serious disturbance last night on the Staten Island ferryboat Southfield, which left St. George about 10:20 o'clock, and while they apparently thought it fun to frighten women and annoy men and break electric light globes, the people didn't, and two of them were arrested when the boat reached this city and locked up in the Old Slip Police Station.

The prisoners are Moe Walfskehl, twenty-five years old, of 164 East Ninetieth Street, and M. Bosthoff, same age, of 64 West Ninety-fifth Street. Three persons who were among those who were maltreated and annoyed by the accused men and others went to the police station and promised to appear at court this morning against them.

The crowd on the boat at first started to beat the seats in the women's cabin with their canes and blow trumpets in the ears of passengers. Then they deliberately smashed the incandescent light globes, which made loud reports as they exploded over the heads of the passengers.

Roland Reed's Condition Unchanged.

Roland Reed, the actor, who has been critically ill for several days in St. Luke's Hospital, was reported to be in the same condition at 1 o'clock this morning. He was resting easily.

SHIPBUILDING FOR THE YEAR.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31.—The total number of vessels built and officially numbered by the Bureau of Navigation during the calendar year just ended was 954, of 267,642 gross tons, compared with 955 of 237,600 gross tons for the year 1898. Steam vessels built during 1899 numbered 421, of 160,132 gross tons, compared with 550 of 169,602 gross tons for 1898. Sailing vessels numbered 533, of 107,510 gross tons, compared with 405 of 67,998 gross tons for 1898. The increase is almost wholly on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, where 658 vessels of 163,519 gross tons were built, compared with 538 vessels of 86,005 gross tons for 1898.

On the Pacific coast only 114 vessels, of 20,037 gross tons, were built, compared with 240 of 61,923 gross tons, for the previous year. This falling off in construction on the Pacific Coast, in spite of the fact that the Alaskan trade next year will be very large, is due partly to the belief that American merchant vessels hitherto employed as transports to Manila will be released and enter the coasting trade in the Spring.

Construction on the lakes comprised 70 vessels, of 72,094 gross tons, compared with 66, of 75,067 gross tons, for 1898; on the Mississippi and Western rivers 112, of 11,942 gross tons, compared with 111, of 14,605 gross tons for 1898.

The total ouput for the United Kingdom for the year has not been ascertained, but it will exceed 744 steamships of 1,363,318 gross tons, practically all of which were steel, built during 1898.

The returns for the first six months of the fiscal year show the construction in the United States of 527 vessels of 133,487 gross tons, compared with 511 vessels of 130,154 gross tons for the corresponding six months of the previous fiscal year. None of the foregoing figures include unrigged barges and canal boats. Including those the total documented tonnage built in the United States during the current fiscal year bids fair to be somewhat over 300,000 gross tons.

MIDNIGHT BICYCLE RACES.

At one minute past 12 o'clock this morning twelve wheelmen started on the Associated Cycle Club's run to Yonkers and Tarrytown. This run is an annual affair, this being the thirteenth year it has been held. The start was made from Fifty-ninth Street and Eighth Avenue, the riders being allowed to take whatever route suited them. The first wheelman to reach Yonkers was to receive a magnum of champagne, and the prizes for the finish at Tarrytown consisted of medals, cups, and various other articles.

The starters were: H. Y. Bedell, Harlem Wheelmen; G. Schrieber, Harlem Wheelmen; Walter Torrence, Riverside Wheelmen; Charles Fisher, Harlem Wheelmen; E. R. Fisher, Harlem Wheelmen; August Klinger, Empire State Wheelmen; W. E. Mosher, Harlem Wheelmen; Salvator Depeitro, Harlem Wheelmen; Daniel Sullivan, Riverside Wheelmen; Maurice Hannbeck, Triumph Wheelmen; Reginald Stafford, Triumph Wheelmen; Herman Schultz, Triumph Wheelmen. The record for the run is fifty-five minutes, made by Thomas Matton of the Harlem Wheelmen four years ago.

The first New Year's bicycle road race under the auspices of the Century Road Club Association of New York was held this morning from the Bedford Rest at Bedford Avenue and Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, to West's Hotel at Valley Stream. John T. Wall, chief centurion of the State, was in charge of the run, and about seventy riders started, among them about half a dozen women. Among the most-noted were Mrs. John Lindsey, Misses Nellie Benson, Jane Yatman, and Lottie Brenden, Charles Mock, William MacKenzie, "Gus" Egloff, and Paul Thomas. Eight prizes were offered for the men and three for the women, the first prize for the men being a magnum of champagne. It was expected that the race would be very close. The event will hereafter be an annual affair and will be open to all amateur riders.

THE WEATHER.

LOCAL FORECAST.—Probably snow, southerly winds, becoming variable.

The pressure has fallen generally and decidedly from the Mississippi Valley eastward and risen throughout the West. The low area noted Saturday night on the West Gulf Coast has moved to Northern Florida, while the one over Lake Superior has developed to the southward; those in the extreme northeast and Central Rocky Mountain region have practically disappeared. High pressure still persists in the extreme Northwest. Temperatures continue low, although there has been a general rise east of the Rocky Mountains except along the West Gulf Coast. There has been snow throughout the South and local snows in the lake regions, Upper Mississippi Valley, and central west. In the Pacific Coast and plateau regions there were light rains and snows, except in the southern portions, with somewhat higher temperatures. Snow is indicated generally in the Atlantic States to-day, except rain in the extreme southern portions. Snow is also likely to-day in the upper Ohio Valley and lake regions, except along Western Lake Michigan. Over the remaining districts fair weather is indicated to-day. To-morrow generally fair weather will prevail, except in New England and in the immediate vicinity of the great lakes, where snow will probably continue. It will be colder to-day in Wyoming and eastern Colorado, and temperature will continue low elsewhere. In the New England and Middle Atlantic Coast States, the winds will be variable to-day, while on the South Coast they will be fresh northerly.

The record of temperature for the twenty-four hours ended at midnight, taken from THE NEW YORK TIMES'S thermometer and from the thermometer of the Weather Bureau, is as follows:

	—Weather Bureau—		TIMES.
	1898.	1899.	1899.
3 A. M.	53	10	15
6 A. M.	46	8	13

6 P. M.	25	19	21
9 P. M.	20	21	21

THE TIMES'S thermometer is 6 feet above the street level; that of the Weather Bureau is 285 feet above the street level.

Average temperatures yesterday were as follows:

Corresponding date 1898	33⅛
Corresponding date for last twenty-five years	31

The maximum temperature yesterday was 21 degrees at 10 P. M. and the minimum 9 degrees at 6 A. M. The humidity at 8 A. M. was 68 per cent. and at 8 P. M. 73 per cent. The barometer at 8 A. M. read 29.95 and at 8 P. M. 29.90.

FOUR LIVES LOST IN A FIRE?

Hotel, Armory, and Other Buildings at Fairmount, West Va., Burn.

FAIRMOUNT, West Va., Dec. 31.—An explosion of gas in the Kinkead Hotel to-day caused a destructive fire, and probably the loss of four lives. An unknown man leaped from the fourth story window of the hostelry when the fire was at its height and received probably fatal injuries. He was removed to the hospital, and remains in an unconscious condition. Three other persons, inmates of the hotel, are missing, and a search is being made in the ruins for their bodies.

Besides the hotel, a large tenement, Mosgroe's dry goods store, Snyder's grocery, and the armory building, containing a Gatling gun, Springfield rifles, with 5,000 loads of ammunition, tents uniforms, and other equipment belonging to the West Virginia National Guard, were destroyed or ruined. The total loss will approximate $60,000, with small insurance

WHITE MAY TRY A SORTIE

Boers Report That the British Are Preparing for a Move.

LADYSMITH IN HARD STRAITS

Sickness and Boer Shells Working Disaster to the Garrison—Buller's Men Make Bad Mistakes.

LONDON, Jan. 1.—A dispatch to The Daily Mail from Lorenzo Marques, dated Dec. 29, says:

"It is reported from Ladysmith by way of Pretoria that the British are destroying their heavy cannon prior to a final sortie."

The latest Ladysmith advices show that the Boer shelling is becoming deadly, while sickness and ennui must also be telling strongly upon the garrison.

All the correspondents are beginning to hint of a forward movement on the part of Gen. Buller, the danger of which is indicated in a dispatch to The Daily Telegraph from Frere recording the unfortunate failure of two reconnaissances. In one case the Boer lines at Colenso were to have been bombarded by night.

Mounted men drew the Boer fire, and it was intended that the naval guns should bombard. This, however, the latter failed to do, owing to some misunderstanding, and the reconnoitring party was compelled to flounder back to camp through the wet and stormy night, marching in mud and water and with the greatest discomfort.

According to the same correspondent, a similar fate awaited another reconnaissance in the opposite direction.

"Two detachments," says the dispatch, "lost their way in the darkness. They were unable to effect a junction for attack; they stumbled into water-holes and were out all night, only to return drenched and disappointed in the morning."

It is roughly estimated that there are 25,000 Boers between Ladysmith and Colenso, some 400 being on the south side of the Tugela River. At all points the enemy shows ceaseless activity.

The following heliograph message has been received by way of Weenen from Ladysmith, dated Wednesday, Dec. 27:

"The Boers are actively bombarding the town. One shell struck the Devonshire mess tent, killing Capt. Dalzel and wounding seven Lieutenants—Dent, Twiss, Tringnam, Caffyn, Byrne, Scafe, and Kane."

A later dispatch from Ladysmith by way of Weenen, dated Friday, Dec. 29, says:

"All well. The Boers have been firing plugged shells containing plum pudding and the compliments of the season. They are still fortifying their positions and are evidently determined to make a firm stand."

A dispatch from Frere, Natal, dated Saturday, Dec. 30, says that, owing to the flooding of the Tugela River, a large party of Boers have been cut off on the south side. They are reported to be in the hills to the right of Chieveley.

The War Office publishes the following despatch, dated yesterday, from the general officer commanding at Cape Town:

"Hear unofficially from Sterkstroom that a British reconnaissance, seven miles north of Dordrecht, engaged superior forces and was obliged to retire on Dordrecht.

"Later.—Montmorency, on Dec. 30, met superior force using artillery, operated to rear of Boers. In course of the day he was compelled to withdraw to Dordrecht in good order, assisted by sixty men sent from Dordrecht, before which we are in position for defense. The following casualty reported—one severely wounded."

A correspondent at Storkstroom, telegraphing Dec. 31, says:

"Capt. Montmorency of the Twenty-first Lancers, with a patrol of 120, was reconnoitering eight miles north of Bordrecht. He met the Boers at Iabuschagne's Nek. They opened fire, and the British replied.

The fighting continued for six hours, when the Boers received strong reinforcements, including artillery. Capt. Montmorency retired and took a defensive position at Derdrecht. The Boers did not pursue him. It is believed that they retired on their main body. Their losses are not known."

The Queen's message to the British troops in South Africa was sent to every General. It ran thus:

"I wish you and all my brave soldiers a happy Christmas. God protect and bless you all."

A despondent view is taken here of the Mafeking sortie. No word regarding any such movement has yet arrived from British sources; and the feeling of suspense is deepening, as it is feared Col. Baden-Powell's silence indicates that his position is becoming desperate.

TO SUPPRESS A DUTCH REVOLT.

British in Cape Colony Preparing to Keep the Disloyal Burghers Down by Force.

CAPE TOWN, Dec. 28.—The colonial authorities are using every precaution to prevent an insurrection on the part of the disloyal Dutch in Cape Colony and to suppress a rising if it should occur. Everywhere the British colonists are being organized into home guards, drilled, armed, and ready to act in their respective localities should armed Dutch colonials gather.

The theory is that the British home-staying colonials should be fully prepared to cope with the Dutch colonials without the aid of regulars.

The alertness of the British makes united action on the part of pro-Boer residents difficult. Unable to act openly, they slip away singly or in small groups to join the enemy's forces. The authorities have been informed of many centres of agitation, which it is considered undesirable to particularize, but there is nothing like concerted action apparent over wide districts.

The case of Mr. Michan, solicitor to the De Beers Company, who is accused of treason, acquires increased importance, as he has been transferred from the custody of the civil authorities here to the military authorities at De Aar. His high position causes the Dutch to watch his case keenly.

Parties of Boers have been operating some seventy miles south of Lord Methuen's position. Boers appeared on Christmas Day near the railway, about twenty-nine miles south of De Aar. A force of the Duke of Edinburgh's Own Volunteers prepared to engage them, but the enemy retired.

Another party fired into a British patrol camp during the night of Wednesday, Dec. 27. This was near Victoria Road. An attempt was made not far from that point to damage the railway. One man was caught in the act and shot.

A similar attempt was made between Multiersolei and Klapmuts, but the would-be wreckers escaped. Like attempts are reported from several other points. Evidently small parties of Boers or Dutch colonials have been trying to interrupt the movements of trains, but thus far they have been baffled by the elaborate British patroling.

In one case a patrol of regulars fired on a patrol of colonials. The latter were wearing broad-brimmed hats and were mistaken by the British for Boers. No casualties occurred, but in consequence of the incident an order has been issued requiring all classes of troops to wear helmets.

The Daily Mail publishes the following dispatch from Cape Town:

"Ninety-five per cent. of the Bechuana farmers in the Vryburg district joined the Boers, helping them to loot the stores throghout the country north of the Orange River. They also undertook to invest Mafeking, while Gen. Cronje's men went south to meet Lord Methuen. The Government of Bechuanaland is being administered just as if the Dutch had been in possession for ages."

The imperial authorities at the Cape have seized at Adelaide an immense consignment of arms and ammunition, marked "Biscuits" sent by Boers to Dutch farmers in that neighborhood.

IRISH AGENTS IN AFRICA.

Alleged Work for Boer Government—Clan-Na-Gael Men Excited by Bundesrath's Seizure.

News of the capture by a British cruiser in Delagoa Bay of the German steamship Bundesrath, alleged to have aboard recruits for the Boer Army, was the cause of considerable excitement in this city yesterday among members of the First Regiment, Irish Volunteers, the military organization established by the Clan-na-Gael several years ago. It is said that a number of Clan-na-Gael agents are now in South Africa ready to receive recruits sent there by the order. Although the movements of the volunteers are guarded with great secrecy, it is also said that an understanding exists between the official representatives of the South African Republic and the heads of the Irish Physical Force Party, whereby members of the volunteers in this city would be transported to the scene of war. The officers of the local organization deny any knowledge of the movement.

The Irish Volunteers were organized in this city in December, 1895, by Col. James Moran, acting on the authority of the Clan-na-Gael. Almost simultaneously similar organizations were established in other large cities throughout the United States. The members were picked Clan-na-Gael men whose antecedents had been carefully investigated, the purpose of the organization, as announced at the time, being to take advantage of a crisis in English affairs caused either by home insurrection or a foreign war, such as that in which Great Britain now finds herself engaged. Just before the outbreak of the Boer war the abandonment of this military organization was seriously discussed, it is said, within the Clan-na-Gael. Largely because of the insistence of Col. Thomas F. Lynch, formerly a Major in the Sixty-ninth Regiment, National Guard, who served in the Spanish war, the volunteer organization was continued. The total membership throughout the United States is now estimated at 22,000.

Each lodge of the Clan-na-Gael supports a military company. The First Regiment, in this city, is composed of military companies made up from the Owen Rhoe, Geraldine, Innisfail, Sunburst, Speranza, Thomas Davis, Ennis Hope, Wolf Tone, Nappertandy, Emmet, Parnell, John Mitchel, and Sarsfield Lodges. The regiment is commanded by Col. Lynch, who brought with him from the Sixty-ninth Regiment a large number of men who had served under Col. Duffy in the Spanish-American war. The battalions are headed by Majors Cassin and Healy, formerly of the Sixty-ninth. The company commanders are Capts. Crowley, Nolan, Milligan, Gilgar, Rotchford, Bolger, Kerwind, Cassidy, Moore, and Doyle.

The activity among the Irish military organizations throughout the United States is reflected in the great demand from Irish societies for drill regulations of the United States Army. One firm in this city that publishes these regulations has filled large orders from such sources within the last few days.

A prominent member of the Clan-na-Gael said yesterday:

"This is the precise occasion that was in mind when we organized the volunteer movement. If they can be of no service now, it is doubtful whether they ever could, and if they do not figure in this war, it is likely the movement will be abandoned. Never have the Irishmen in America had so powerful a military force behind them as has been given by the volunteer organization. We count on them now to vindicate the wisdom of their formation. Being drilled soldiers, they will be especially welcome to the Boers."

Col. Lynch when asked about the connection of the volunteers with the Boer war, said:

"I cannot speak of the private affairs of the organization, and as for the report that we have an understanding with the Transvaal, I know nothing about it. I know nothing about an invasion of England or Canada, either."

"Will the seizure of the German ship prevent further Boer recruiting among the volunteers?" he was asked.

"I have not admitted that we have been so recruiting," replied the Colonel. Further than this he refused to talk.

ACTOR'S WIFE ATTACKS HIM.

Mrs. Morgan Held on Charges of Intoxication and Assault.

E. J. Morgan, the actor who has been in the courts lately in connection with domestic troubles, called upon the police last night to help him in escaping annoyance by Mrs. Morgan.

The actor's wife, Adelaide Cushman Morgan, just after dark last night stood in front of her husband's house at 237 West Thirty-fourth Street and waited. After half an hour Morgan came. The woman immediately grabbed him and shrieked. He got away from her as best he could and tried to enter a cab which stood before the door. Mrs. Morgan got in also. She screamed "Murder!" "Police!" and a crowd gathered. Morgan tried to walk away, but the woman clung to him, tried to strike him, and called him opprobious names.

A policeman appeared, and both Morgan and his wife accompanied him in the cab to the West Thirty-seventh Street Police Station. There Morgan charged his wife with annoying him, and the woman charged him with every crime.

The woman was locked up on the charge of intoxication and attempted assault. The prisoner said she was twenty-six years old, but would give no address.

STATEN ISLAND FIREMEN BUSY.

Respond to Five Alarms, One of Them False—Damage Done, $4,500.

The firemen of Richmond Borough responded to five alarms of fire from 10 o'clock Saturday evening to 2:15 o'clock yesterday afternoon. At 10 o'clock Saturday evening an alarm was sounded for a fire in the large shipyard and marine railway of Sandford, Ross & Sandford on Bay Street, Clifton. The firemen responded promptly, and found the office building, a frame structure in the front part of the premises, in flames. The fire was extinguished with little difficulty. The damage amounted to about $200.

Fire started at 1:15 o'clock in a one-story frame barn on Forest Avenue, Huguenot, owned by Mrs. Mary Perry and occupied by Bernard Koenig. The building was quickly consumed, together with its contents, consisting of two horses, three cows, fifty chickens, five tons of straw, four wagons, six sets of harness, and a number of farming implements. The members of the Huguenot Engine Company, recently organized in that section, rendered what assistance they could, but as they have not yet received their apparatus they could do but little. The loss on the building and contents amounted to $3,000, insured for $2,000. The cause of the fire is a mystery.

Flames were discovered at 1 o'clock in the morning in the rear of a two-story frame building at 115 Jersey Street, New Brighton, occupied by William Witteberg and owned by Timothy Hurley. The damage to the building and furniture amounted to $800.

The fourth alarm was sounded about 5 o'clock, but it proved to be false. The last alarm was for a fire in a four-story building used as a dormitory in St. Michael's Home in the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin at Mount Loretto, Pleasant Plains. The fire was discovered by Frederick Spindler, a fireman stationed on the grounds. He called out the men employed in the grounds and sent word to the Tottenville Engine Company, and the fire was soon under control. The damage amounted to $500. The fire was caused by a defective steam pipe.

IRISH PRAISE THE BOERS

ANTI-BRITISH DEMONSTRATION

Audience Hisses Chamberlain and Cheers for Krueger—Fitzgerald, Sulzer, and Cummings Speak.

The Academy of Music was filled last night with wildly enthusiastic Irishmen, assembled to give expression to their sympathy with the Boers, with whom Great Britain is now fighting.

The meeting was held under the auspices of the United Irish American Societies, and so many desired to attend it that the doors at length had to be closed for the sake of safety, leaving a good many disappointed people in Irving Place.

The meeting was one of stormy enthusiasm in which vehement antagonism to Great Britain was even more noticeable than sympathy with Oom Paul. The audience groaned and hooted and hissed at the mention of Chamberlain. They hissed England, the Queen, Cecil Rhodes, the Jameson raid, the Anglo-American alliance, President McKinley, Ambassador Choate, Secretary Hay, William Waldorf Astor, and Bradley Martin, each in turn, as one of their speakers associated the names in question with some reference to British policy. The crowd went into corresponding raptures of delight at the mention of Paul Krüger's name, references to British reverses, and promises of Irish independence.

Many men interrupted the speakers from time to time with wild shouts of "Volunteer! Volunteer!" in proof of their desire to help the Boers.

Senator William E. Mason of Illinois was the chief speaker. The audience greeted him as the champion in this country of the Boers, and gave him such an ovation as would have moved the most stolid recipient. Justice Fitzgerald of the Supreme Court, who was introduced by M. J. Jennings as the presiding officer, and Representatives Sulzer and Cummings also spoke.

The boxes and galleries as well as the stage were profusely decorated with American flags and banners, Irish and Boer flags, seals of the State, and emblems of the Clan-na-Gael, and the Ancient Order of Hibernians. An orchestra, stationed just below the stage, played "The Wearing of the Green" and "The Star-Spangled Banner." In one corner of the parquet there was a group of enthusiasts armed with American and Irish flags, and when the spirit moved them they rose and waved them with all the ardor of a collegian at a football game.

MANY FRIENDLY INTERRUPTIONS.

Interruptions of all sorts were fired at the speakers all through the evening, but they were practically all encouraging in tone. Such shouts as "Give it to them!" "Let them know who we are," and "Go ahead!" were innumerable.

The audience shouted that Chamberlain was a turncoat, and howled with delight at Mr. Sulzer's suggestion that Rhodes was locked up in one of his mines at Kimberley and would have to eat diamonds. Many of the sentiments expressed by the speakers were greeted with roars of applause, in which the house joined as one person, and a reference to Great Britain's desire to promote civilization called forth derisive laughter. There were many women in the boxes and parquet who seemed to be as interested as the men, if less demonstrative.

Justice Fitzgerald was enthusiastically greeted when he stepped forward to speak, and the band played "The Wearing of the Green" at his honor. He said in part:

"It is a great pleasure for me to meet tonight so many of my fellow-citizens assembled for the purpose of expressing our deep indignation at the unjustifiable war now being waged by the arms of Great Britain [hisses] upon the people of the Transvaal and to give utterance to our sentiments of deep admiration for the gallant stand being made by the embattled farmers of South Africa in defense of their property, their lives, and their liberty.

"The Colonial Secretary [hisses] woefully miscalculated when he brought about the condition of affairs with which England stands confronted to-day. What was it to him that a little republic stood in the way of the acquisition of territory rich in ore, with gold and diamond fields? A vast array of power, according to the term of the jingo, was all that was necessary to cause the Boer to surrender, but the humiliated and defeated arms of Great Britain [hisses] were practically destroyed before they were able to encroach one foot upon the soil of the republic. [Cheers.]

"It is full of inspiration and of hope for every lover of liberty, as it is a menace and a warning to every tyrant and despot, Gatacre, Methuen, and Buller, [hisses] commanding larger forces than those that followed Wellington in the Napoleonic wars, have been separately met and defeated [cheers] and if the reinforcements that are now expected including the yeomen [laughter and cheers,] the foxhunters, and possibly, by the permission of the Queen, the Duke of Connaught, should be pushed into the field, the cup of England's bitterness will brim still further over.

TRUE SENTIMENT OF AMERICA.

"There are those who probably regard a salute or not from the wearer of a coronet as of more importance than their own National independence. There are other self-expatriated Americans whose chief ambition is to belong to the Prince of Wales's set, but we of the United Irish Societies, while we have no particular liking for England, [laughter]—and small blame to us for that—still at the same time are too honest by nature to allow her to be imposed upon by those persons of whom I have spoken, and who are the only ones that talk, although they talk loudly and frequently, of the ties of a common Saxon origin or a union of English-speaking people.

"We understand it, and are willing to give England the benefit of our information by telling her that they no more represent the true sentiment of America upon this war in the Transvaal than do the marionettes of a painted show represent the men and women of whom they are the miserable caricatures.

"To-night we extend a friendly hand across the waters from the great Republic of the West to the Republic of the Boers in South Africa, and we trust that the day will not be long delayed when they will be able to drive the soldiers of Victoria to their ships and proclaim the absolute independence of the land that they so truly love and on whose behalf they are so heroically and gallantly fighting."

As Justice Fitzgerald finished a huge horseshoe of flowers was handed up to him by his admirers. Then a man arose in the audience and shouted:

"Mr. Chairman, where would the English be only for Ireland?" [Great applause.]

"That question will be answered," replied the Justice. "If you will have patience to wait for the next speaker. I will give it to him for a text." Then he introduced Representative William Sulzer, of whom the audience said, "He's all right, you bet he is!"

"Majuba Hill to the Boers is like Bunker Hill to us," began Mr. Sulzer, "and will live as long in history to inspire liberty-loving men." He said that Gladstone told Lord Derby, then Secretary for the Colonies, "and a very different man from Joe Chamberlain—" here he was interrupted by howls and hisses from all parts of the house, mingled with cries of "Judas! Judas! Judas!" had said at the time of the treaty of 1884 that the South African Republic was absolutely free and independent, and "this betrayer of Gladstone and of Irish home rule in Parliament" three years ago declared that for England to interfere with the Transvaal would be as immoral as it would be unwise.

SECRET AGREEMENT ALLEGED.

"The liberty-loving world to-day characterizes it as immoral, and the English Government realizes that it is very unwise," he added. "There is no doubt that there is to-day a secret agreement between the White House and Downing Street. I make this charge publicly and as a representative of the people. [Great applause.] In the name of all that's just and honorable, should we now refuse to sympathize with the brave Boers of South Africa?" Here a cry of "Volunteer!" from the audience brought out a storm of applause and cheers. Mr. Sulzer concluded by quoting a passage from Kipling's "Recessional," beginning, "The tumult and the shouting dies."

Senator Mason was then introduced, and as he advanced most of the audience rose, and waving flags and handkerchiefs, gave vent to a shout of greeting which dwarfed anything that had preceded it. When the crowd finally subsided Justice Fitzgerald called for three cheers for the Senator, and this time the people surpassed their previous efforts, even the men on the stage rising and frantically cheering.

Senator Mason said in beginning:

"We are here to-night to send words of sympathy and cheer to the farmers of South Africa, who are fighting for their country and for their homes. Truly this is not a partisan meeting, unless it be partisanship to love our own institutions and believe in liberty for the human race.

"We ask no man as he comes in this door his political or his religious creed. We only ask the questions, 'Do you believe in our institutions? Are you satisfied with our country? Do you believe in the divinity of man or the divinity of kings?'

"Those are questions that rise above party and above State, National, and city issues. I mean to be fair and dispassionate, and to express our sympathy on solid grounds. They tell us we are likely to offend somebody.

"If you said a prayer you would offend the devil. There is a class of distinguished citizens here who roll up their trousers when it rains in London and who would drive a horse backward and tandem both if it was fashionable there, and who absorb their statesmanship from across the water. They tell us, 'Really now, you know, let us be fair. Let us show the real situation there, and if you can vote resolutions of sympathy all right; if not, all right.'

TREATY RIGHTS EXCEEDED.

"I must ask your attention for a few moments to the real situation. In the last war in South Africa, even before Majuba Hill, Gladstone had sent a conciliatory message suggesting the cessation of hostilities, and yet the Lilliputian statesmen who rattles in his shoes to-day is belittling his character, though he was willing to take the crumbs that fell from his table, and would make it appear that that war was closed through fear on the part of Gladstone.

"Under the terms of the existing treaty Great Britain had no more right to go into the Transvaal and dictate how it should conduct the suffrage than I would have to go into your house and tell you how to manage your wife.

"There is not a twelve-year-old boy in the grammar schools of New York but would have answered the Lord High Duke of the Checkerboard 'If you're going to vote under this flag, then, by the Eternal, you must swear to fight for it!' Speaking for the Greek seventy years ago President Monroe was not afraid to express to the world his sympathy with one republic. [Cries of 'How about McKinley? He's a hypocrite."]

"They say that resolutions that you people pass here will have no influence, but under this flag we are all Americans, and there has never been a battle for liberty on this continent that the Irish-American has not been there, and I want to tell these gentlemen that the feeling shown here to-night isn't limited to the Irish societies of New York, but extends all over the country. From one ocean to the other there comes up, not from any one class, but from every lover of liberty, a prayer that the Boer Republic may live.

"They tell us that England was very good to us in the Spanish war. [Cries, "We didn't need her."] Suppose she was? We were fighting for liberty, to stop the murder of women and children in Cuba, and to make a new republic at the footstool of the continent. We unlimbered our guns and cleared our decks in the cause of liberty. If she did keep her hands off, is it necessary that we should sell our birthright and the eagle shriek no more until the lion growls?

"The people of England have always been our friends. The English weavers, when left without cotton, were asked to pass resolutions supporting the Southern Confederacy. They said 'we may starve, but we will never pass a resolution in the interest of slavery.'

FALSE PLEA OF CIVILIZATION.

"The British Government's claim of a right to interfere in the internal affairs of South Africa is a mere pretense. They had made up their minds to insult, bulldoze, and browbeat the Dutchman until he should get his gun and come out for war, and they have got what they went for. I am glad to speak on this night, for no day, no night, no place, is too sacred to speak for the liberty of humankind. I only want you to take home with you this thought—that the resolutions you pass speak for human liberty and human homes."

Representative Amos J. Cummings, the next speaker, referred with gusto to the fact that the Boer had "got his tusk in the flank of the British lion" and was "making that beast drag his measly carcass over the sands in pain," a figure of speech which brought forth applause. Mr. Cummings went sarcastically to refer to "our dear old Mother England, who tried to strangle us in our infancy; our dear old mother, who tried to throttle us when we were a full-grown boy in 1812; our darling old mother, who, through one of our Ambassadors, now Secretary of State, tried to rob us of a port in Alaska and is now succeeding."

He added: "Oh, yes, how we do love our dear mother, [laughter,] who is to-day seizing our ships in neutral waters and robbing them!"

Mr. Cummings referred to England as the "national jackal," and called Mr. Chamberlain a liar, adding that the term was not too harsh for him. He also paid his respects to William Waldorf Astor and Bradley Martin for quitting this country, and referred to "Winston Churchill, who, when captured, said he was a non-combatant, and after he escaped bragged that he was a combatant and conducted the fight from the armored train."

When he referred to the troops England had in South Africa one man shouted, with the Irish Fusileers in mind, "There were some Irish there, too."

"Yes," said Mr. Cummings, "and the Boers disposed of them very quickly."

The whole house broke into another frantic roar of approval. It shouted in similar fashion when Mr. Cummings said that if the Boers won the Irish people would give an account of themselves, too.

Augustine E. Costello then made a speech and read a set of resolutions expressing sympathy with the Boers. The document referred to "the evident conspiracy of British agents acting in the interest of stock jobbers" to promote an entangling alliance with Great Britain.

It condemned the British for carrying on the war and seizing American food supplies in transit to a neutral port. It deprecated Canada's action in sending troops to defeat the Boers, and it appealed to the American people to "extend the hand of fraternal fellowship to the patriots and heroes now so bravely fighting to maintain their liberty." The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

FENIANS STORING AMMUNITION?

Explosives Said to be Hidden on the Canadian Border.

Special to The New York Times.

BURLINGTON, Vt., Dec. 31.—It is reported that the Fenians are engaged in storing large quantities of dynamite, lyddite ammunition, and supplies in a few selected repositories in remote districts in Vermont and Maine near the Canadian boundary line. The information comes from persons who claim to have knowledge of the purchase of some of the supplies and others who learned of their transportation by railroad disguised as groceries. Dynamite and other explosives have been secured in surprisingly large quantities and stored under ground on the Vermont border, while quantities of canned meats have been hidden in some large barns of sympathizing farmers on the Maine line near New Hampshire.

It is said that an efficient ambulance corps is being organized under the supervision of a few loyal Irish women and surgeons who were in the Red Cross work in Cuba. They are also preparing a large number of "first aid" packages for the invading force.

The movement is the work of the Irish element of the larger cities, but it is a fact that a large and important work is being done among the farmers of the border States. A schedule is being arranged of farmers who can furnish wagons and horses and oxen for transportation purposes, as this is regarded as a most important detail. A careful study is being made of the small railroad branches in Northern New England, and places are being located where the road could be captured by a very small force.

AMERICAN REGIMENT FOR BOERS.

ORANGE CITY, Iowa, Dec. 31.—An entire regiment of soldiers is said to be en route from the Dutch colony in this county to join the Boers in the Transvaal. If seemingly well authenticated accounts are to be believed, the organizers of the force are not attempting to send the entire body to the seat of war at once, but are content to ship them out three or four at a time by different routes.

The recruits were not all gathered in Sioux County, but the money to hire and equip them was all raised in or near Orange City and Sioux Centre. That drilling has been in progress in remote parts of the county for some time is certain, though much secrecy was observed. It is said that only picked men have been accepted.

WASHINGTON AS A MASON

HOLD ANNIVERSARY SERVICES

Sermons on His Life and Work at the Masonic Temple and Many City Churches.

One hundred years ago yesterday public exercises were held in this city on account of the death of George Washington. The Masonic fraternity of which he was a member took a prominent part in the ceremonials, and yesterday its members commemorated the one hundredth anniversary of the occasion by attending special religious services. The holding of these services was suggested in a circular recently issued by Grand Master Wright D. Pownall of the State of New York. There were no Masonic ceremonies in the churches, but the Masons who attended wore the regalia of the order.

Many lodges were represented at the special Grand Lodge service, which was held in the morning in St. Andrew's Protestant Episcopal Church at One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Street and Fifth Avenue. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. George R. Van De Water, the Grand Chaplain. Among those in the church were Grand Master Pownall and Grand Secretary E. M. L. Ehlers. Dr. Van De Water, in his sermon, referred to Washington as an Episcopalian and a Mason. Referring to the fact that Washington left no progeny, Dr. Van De Water said: "Perhaps it is just as well for this country that he left no descendants to detract from his fame."

Memorial services were held by the lodges of the Fourth Masonic District in the Grand Lodge room of the Masonic Temple in the afternoon, members of twenty-five lodges participating. The Apollo Quartet furnished the music. District Deputy Grand Master George H. Phillips in his introductory remarks told of the services held a hundred years ago in St. Paul's Chapel. On the table in front of him was the Bible, preserved by St. John's Lodge, upon which Washington took the oath of office at his first inauguration in this city. The Bible was the one then in use in St. John's Lodge. The Rev. John T. Patey of St. Luke's Church delivered the principal address. "Washington was a loyal Mason as well as a loyal churchman," said Dr. Patey. "Masons of to-day will do well to follow the example of Washington and the Masons of his day. The Masons of Washington's time took care to bring God into their lodges."

The lodges of the Sixth and Seventh Masonic districts held services at 4 P. M. in St. Paul's Chapel, where the exercises 100 years ago were held. The church was filled far beyond its seating capacity and a majority of the men were in Masonic regalia. The service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Van De Water, the Grand Chaplain, assisted by the Rev. W. Montague Geer, the Rev. Robert Morris Kemp, and the Rev. T. J. Crosby. Washington's pew was draped with the National flag and was unoccupied. A double quartet under the direction of Leo Koder furnished the music. Dr. Van De Water preached a brief sermon in which he referred to the life of Washington, the importance of his life on the American Nation, and the lessons taught by his career. Washington's life, he said, was as nearly as possible up to the standard prescribed by true Masonry.

Five hundred members of the Masonic fraternity marched yesterday morning to Temple Emanu-El, where special services were conducted by Dr. Silverman. The Masonic bodies present were members of the Mount Moriah; Centennial, Darcey, National, Manonadie, Mount Neboh, Empire City, and True Craftsman's Lodges. Dr. Silverman, in his address, spoke of the life of Washington, and dwelt particularly upon the part he had in the formation of the Nation. "Washington," said Dr. Silverman, "gave us our great and high standard of simple American citizenship, both in public and private life; our democracy was his, and our freedom from monarchical forms due to his great love of simplicity, and even our flag is but an elaborated form of his armorial device. In short, turn where you will, you will find Washington's master hand, and always for the good and benefit of our people. It might be that he builded better than he knew, but the great absence of errors shows it was the result of a careful, master mind that has given us our high standards and ideals, truly American."

The Washington memorial service of Franklin Lodge No. 216 was held last evening at the Washington Heights Methodist Episcopal Church, One Hundred and Fifty-second Street and Amsterdam Avenue. The Rev. A. E. Barnett, Chaplain of Franklin Lodge and pastor of the church, delivered the sermon.

Other churches in which special Masonic devotional services took place were the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian, the Baptist Church of the Epiphany, the Hamilton Grange Reformed Church, the Tremont Congregational Church, and the Church of the Saviour.

The Masons of the Second District, embracing twenty-three lodges, assembled last evening in the First Reformed Church at Bedford Avenue and Clymer Streets, Brooklyn, where the Rev. Howard Wilbur Ennis preached a sermon on "The Message of Washington." The full choir of the church rendered a special musical programme.

CHARLES RICHMAN'S MARRIAGE.

Miss Jane Grey of Troy Becomes the Actor's Bride.

The marriage of Miss Jane Grey of Troy, N. Y., to Charles Richman, the leading man for Miss Annie Russell in "Miss Hobbs," was solemnized yesterday afternoon at St. George's Church. The Rev. Dr. William S. Rainsford officiated and a special musical programme was offered by the organist, William C. Chester. The bridal procession approached the altar to strains from "Lohengrin" and retired to the measures of Mendelssohn's Wedding March.

The bride was given away by Edward Stevens. Harold R. Heaton acted as best man, and the ushers were the Earl of Yarmouth, Walter Peice, White Whittlesey, Robert Reed, William Harcourt, and Francis Carlyle.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. John Drew, Mrs. John Gilbert, Wilton Lackaye, Mr. and Mrs. Nat C. Goodwin, Miss Annie Russell, Miss May Irwin, Mr. and Mrs. William Gillette, Miss Isabelle Hasbins, Harry Woodruff, and Marshall P. Wilder.

Immediately after the ceremony the wedding party went to the country house of Walter Price on Staten Island, where a dinner was served.

FIVE HORSES PERISH BY FIRE.

Flames Cause a Loss of $35,000 in Jersey City.

Fire occurred yesterday in a one-story frame stable in the rear of W. A. Gavenesch & Co.'s wholesale grocery, 548 and 550 Newark Avenue, Jersey City. The flames spread so rapidly that two alarms were given at once. There were seven horses in the stable, only two of which were saved by the fire spread to the grocery and also to J. J. Ewald's furniture establishment, a frame building two stories high at 544 and 546 Newark Avenue.

The stable, grocery, and furniture shop were burned, including nearly all of Ewald's stock and most of that of Gavenesch & Co. The losses are covered by insurance. They are: Ewald, $15,000; Gavenesch & Co., $12,000; Coates, estate, to which the buildings belonged, $8,000. The cause of the fire is unknown.

Equitable Life's Business for 1899.

Figures published by the Equitable Life Assurance Society in a preliminary statement of its business for 1899, show $1,050,000,000 as the outstanding insurance on its books. That the society has fully participated in the general prosperity is shown in the statement that it wrote over $200,000,000 of new business during the past year. The assets shown amount to $280,000,000, of which $62,000,000 is surplus to policyholders. The motto of the society is: "Not for a day, but for all time."

He was feeling better last evening.

RACING IN WINTER GARB

Road Drivers Visit the Speedway Muffled in Furs.

Wonderful Work of "Jack Frost" on the Rocks Bordering the Drive—Fliers in Lively Brushes.

Muffled in furs and looking more like Laplanders than New Yorkers, road drivers turned out in full force on the Speedway yesterday, and for a couple of hours in the morning there was some lively harness racing. The roadbed, although a little too hard, was in very fair condition, and several fast quarters were trotted and paced. "Jack Frost" had worked wonders in the scenery along the upper end of the roadway, and this came in for as much admiration as the horses. There was plenty of ice in the river, while hanging from the high wall of rocks on the west side of the stretch were thousands of huge icicles that sparkled brilliantly in the sunshine. Back of these hung a curtain of dazzling ice. Water had flowed over the tops of the rocks from the level above and, freezing, had formed a picture of wonderful beauty. To add to the picturesqueness of the scene a herd of goats scampered over the glassy surface of the rocks, evidently enjoying themselves immensely. At frequent intervals huge icicles would fall to the asphalt pavement below with a crash, scattering the ice as well as the goats in all directions.

Among the early arrivals in the stretch was A. M. Rose, behind his team, Sir Eid, 2:14¾, and Island Belle, 2:16¼. They were in the pink of condition, and after several trips up and down the road by way of warming up, the team had a brush with Lottie, 2:29¼, driven by Col. Lawrence. For a quarter the team held the lead. Then Lottie settled into her stride and by the time the half was reached she had overtaken and passed the team, which Mr. Rose pulled up, seeing that the race was lost.

The next lively affair was between Dundess, 2:23¾, driven by H. Zahn, and Madison Chief, driven by M. L. Reid. The horses started on even terms and covered a very fast quarter. Then Miss Miller, driving Jim Dandy, joined in the brush, but he was soon distanced by Dundess, who took the lead and held it to the finish, winning by about a length from Madison Chief.

About this time Dr. Gill, driving Jack, 2:12½, put in an appearance. His first brush was with Mr. Rose's team. The team had a good start, but after traveling a quarter Jack had them at his hubs. Then followed a hard-fought race for the lead, and for a few moments it looked as though Jack would lose his reputation to the team. Near the three-quarter mark Jack showed a burst of speed that carried him by the team and gave him a lead of a couple of lengths when the arch of Washington Bridge was reached. For the remainder of the morning Jack beat every horse he encountered.

The handsome chestnut pacer, King Tom, had a pretty brush with Madison Chief. M. C. Hackett drove King Tom, and he had but little difficulty in piloting him to victory. David B., 2:09¼, driven by J. W. Cornish, showed his heels to Peter H., driven by A. B. Meyer. King Tom then tried a go with E. M. Rose's team, and honors were about even when the horses were pulled up.

Kelly, has completed arrangements for a series of interscholastic competitions, the purpose of which is to select a team to represent Brooklyn in the forthcoming interscholastic gymnastic competitions. The first of the series will be held next week in the gymnasium of the St. Luke's Boys' Club, on Clinton Avenue, near Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn.

THE LICENSING OF ENGINEERS.

Central Federated Union Protests Against a Bill Providing for a State Board.

There was a long discussion at yesterday's meeting of the Central Federated Union over a bill which is to be introduced in the Legislature, providing for the licensing of all engineers in the State by a State board. The stationary engineers have protested against the proposed measure, fearing that if it should be passed locomotive and marine engineers would be able to obtain licenses to run stationary engines and thus compete with them. The authority to issue licenses to engineers for stationary engines under the proposed law is vested in the Police Department, and yesterday the Safety Association of Engineers introduced a resolution into the Central Federated Union protesting against any change in the present laws in regard to the licensing of engineers, and providing that the protest be sent to the Workingmen's State Federation to be transmitted to the Legislature.

Delegate Wilson of the Safety Engineers' Association said that if the bill were passed it would let in all the locomotive and steamboat engineers.

Delegate James P. Archibald of the paperhangers said that the locomotive engineers never sympathized with the other trades unions, and there was no good reason why the Central Federated Union should help them by approving the passage of the bill. If the present law was to be changed at all he would prefer to have a body of good engineers appointed as an examining board. The passage of the present bill, Mr. Archibald thought, meant putting money in the pockets of a few political favorites who would be appointed on the examining board.

"Conditions in engines and machinery have changed greatly in the past few years," said Delegate Cowan of the Amalgamated Engineers. "Electricity and compressed air are becoming the motive powers. The elevated railroads in New York will soon change their motive power to electricity, and that will let out the locomotive engineers that are now employed there. In Brooklyn the change to electricity as the motive power on the elevated railroads is already taking place, and if the bill becomes a law we will have all these locomotive engineers crowding in on the stationary engineers and trying to take their jobs. Besides, I do not believe in concentrating the power of issuing licenses all over the State in one man or body."

Delegate Stewart of the Standard Engineers said there was no danger of the bill passing in its present shape. A conference was to be held in January, he said, at which all the objectionable features in the bill would be eliminated. The bill was, on the whole a good one, and if passed after a few changes it would protect the engineers. "It is well known," continued Delegate Stewart, "that one of the officers in the Licensing Bureau of the Police Department was caught with a bribe of $25 in his pocket. There is a good deal of rottenness in that department. We want to have engineers examined by engineers, and if a locomotive or marine engineer wants to become a stationary engineer he will have to pass an examination under the proposed law."

Delegate Philip Kelly of the Theatrical Protective Union argued against the bill, and, after some further discussion, the resolution to protest against any change in the present law was passed.

Saw No Hope Ahead and Shot Himself.

John Massetter, a German, fifty years old, shot and killed himself in his apartments at 141 Ten Eyck Street, Brooklyn, early yesterday morning. Before taking his life, Massetter wrote a farewell letter to his wife, in which he said he saw no prospects for the new year, and life was not worth living. He begged his wife to forgive him for his act. When Massetter killed himself, his wife was visiting friends. It was long after midnight when she returned, and was horrified to find her husband lying dead on the kitchen floor. The suicide was at one time in good circumstances, but he lost everything by bad speculations. He was then compelled to seek employment as a laborer. Six months ago he lost this work.

EXPLOSION SHAKES HOUSES

CHIMNEY FALLS ON TENEMENT

Families Ordered to Vacate the House Policeman Hurt by a Brick, Scores of Which Fly in All Directions.

The residents within several blocks of the ruins of the wall paper factory of William Campbell & Co., 432-435 East Twenty-fourth Street, which was destroyed by fire Friday night, were startled yesterday afternoon by an explosion which shook their houses and broke windows. Somebody said a boat must have blown up and then somebody said a boat "had" blown up. Thousands of persons rushed toward the Greenpoint Ferry, but they quickly saw the real cause of their alarm.

Assistant Superintendent Cody of the Building Department and a large gang of men were employed all day Saturday and yesterday in throwing down the factory walls, which threatened to collapse and destroy the surrounding buildings. To facilitate matters they used dynamite.

They were working on the Twenty-fourth Street wall, and the workmen put in an extra heavy charge of dynamite. When it exploded the wall fell with a tremendous crash that gave a second tremor to the ground much like an earthquake.

The bricks flew in every direction, some going as far as First Avenue, a long block. Others hit the Greenpoint Ferryhouse, and several members of a funeral party on an outgoing boat had narrow escapes from the missiles. Policeman McCue of the East Twenty-second Street Station stood at First Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street and a fragment of a brick hit his helmet, crushing it and raising a lump on his head as big as an egg.

"Oh my, oh my," the policeman groaned, "I'm done for." Just then a policeman who speaks with a German accent ran up to him. He saw that McCue was not seriously hurt, although he probably had a headache.

"You're not hurt man," he said. "What! are you groaning about a little thing like that? A German would never mind it."

"And if my head was as thick as a Dutchman's neither would I," retorted McCue. He walked over to Bellevue Hospital, where a surgeon laved the bump with soothing application and took a couple of stitches. Then McCue returned to his post.

A large steel chimney was thrown down by the force of the explosion, falling with great force on a tenement house, the property of Robert De Witt, the Chief Inspector of the Department of Highways. Several families within were much frightened and were ordered to vacate by the Building Department officials. None of the tenants was injured, but the building was badly damaged.

General Foreman Daniel Gilroy of the Department of Water Supply, the buildings of which adjoin the Campbell plant and which were much damaged by falling walls Friday night, worked so continuously to save the city property stored there that he contracted a severe cold and is now threatened with pneumonia. He was taken to Bellevue Hospital.

Dr. Christian of Bellevue Hospital caught a severe cold Friday night while attending the firemen injured during the fire and is now confined to his bed with the grip. The fire still smolders and two engines, commanded by Battalion Chief Welch, are playing streams on the ruins constantly.

Drank Silver Cleanser for Wine.

Joseph Landers, forty-six years old, of 239 West Fifteenth Street, was celebrating the coming of the new year at his home last night and came upon a bottle of what he thought to be wine. He drank the contents. It proved to be a mixture for the cleaning of silverware, which made the man ill. He was taken to the New York Hospital, where, after the physicians had worked over him for an hour, it was said that he might live.

ARREST AT THE GILSEY HOUSE.

Frank L. Saxby of Troy Accused of Assaulting Manager Moore.

Frank L. Saxby, an insurance agent of Troy, was locked up in the East Thirtieth Street Police Station last night on a charge of assault preferred by George W. Moore, manager of the Gilsey House. Saxby entered the hotel at 5 o'clock yesterday and asked the clerk in charge of the desk for a package that he had left there. The clerk said he had no way of knowing that Saxby owned the package, and requested him to write the name that was on it. This Saxby refused to do, and it is alleged that he became abusive when the package was refused him.

Mr. Moore was called and attempted to quiet Saxby, but without success. Finally, it is charged, the angry guest picked up the register and brought it down upon Mr. Moore's head, after which he tried to clamber over the desk and in doing so overturned the key rack. Detective Henderson was called in and he placed Saxby under arrest and took him to the station house, where a charge of assault was entered against him. Mr. Moore wanted to make the charge one of attempted robbery, but the police thought he had better make that complaint in court.

CHRISTIAN BROTHERS' SCHOOLS.

No Confirmation of Reported Action Against Teaching the Classics.

The story that the Congregation of the Propaganda has made a report adverse to the teaching of the classics by the Christian Brothers in their schools in this country, has apparently not been officially confirmed. One of the brothers said yesterday that if such a report had been made, the Pope would have to uphold it before it was carried into effect. If he should sustain the report the official notification would come by circular from the Superior General of the order in Paris. In any event there would be no sudden change in the course of study in the various schools and colleges of the Christian Brothers in America, but they would in all probability be permitted to finish the present year's course.

The trouble between the European and American members of the brotherhood has been principally over the teaching of the classics, the argument of the former being that as the Christian Brothers' Schools were originally intended for the poorer people, it was not proper for them to devote time to instructing the children of richer persons. The idea of the American Christian Brothers is to teach all classes, and the claim is made for them that among these lines they have accomplished much more than they would have done if they had adhered strictly to the plans of De La Salle, the founder of the order.

HOTEL CLERK ACCUSED OF THEFT

H. E. Lansing Held for Stealing $1,500 from the Marie Antoinette.

Among the prisoners arraigned yesterday morning before Magistrate Deuel in the West Side Police Court was Harry E. Lansing, thirty-two years old, of 303 West Fourteenth Street, who until six weeks ago was a clerk in the Hotel Marie Antoinette. He was charged by the proprietor of the hotel, A. R. Keen, with having appropriated to his own use $1,500, a shortage of that amount having been discovered in his accounts. He was held in $3,000 bail for examination to-morrow.

Mr. Keen said last evening that the shortage was discovered about the middle of November, and Lansing was asked to explain matters or make good the sum missing. He promised to do so the following day, but the next day he did not appear, and he was not seen again until he was arrested on Saturday by Patrolman James Fitzgibbons of the West Sixty-eighth Street Station. Lansing received a salary of $100 a month and had been employed in the hotel about three years.

TATTOO ARTISTS AT WAR.

Dispute in the Courts as to the Rights of an Instrument.

Prof. Samuel O'Reilly and Prof. Elmer E. Getchell, rival practitioners in the art of tattooing, in Chatham Square, are having a dispute in the Federal Court as to who is or is not the inventor of the instrument they use in decorating their customers. The suit was brought by Prof. O'Reilly about a year ago, who charged that Prof. Getchell was illegally using the machine patented by him. Prof. Getchell retorted that the main part of the device was patented by Edison, and that neither man could get out a patent.

Additional complexity in the patent rights appears from the fact that Prof. O'Reilly has brought into the case a paper granting him a patent for an "ink reservoir" attachment for an electric pencil, over which the cause between the men is being fought by several lawyers.

So much for the legal troubles. There are some others, the main one of which seems to be that Prof. O'Reilly thinks his rival is too near for his business. The two professors are spending much of their time pending the next hearing in their suit next Thursday in making charges against each other.

Italian's Wounds Self-Inflicted.

Peter de Fenst, the Italian who was found cut and bleeding in his fruit shop at First Avenue and Twenty-third Street, Saturday night, and was believed to be the victim of an assault, confessed last night that he had inflicted the wounds he suffers himself. Detective Petrocino discovered that the man's clothing was not cut, and when he closely questioned him got him to admit that his injuries were self-inflicted.

STOLEN CLOTHES A HANDICAP.

Two Men Who Had Donned Several Suits Apiece Could Not Run When the Police Chased Them.

Policemen Maher and Meehan passed Isaac Schumlovits's clothing shop at 2,333 Second Avenue yesterday afternoon. From force of habit Maher looked into the place to see if everything was all right. He noticed two men in the rear of the store who looked much stouter than the proprietor of the place and his clerk.

"Schumlovits and his clerk must be eating patent food," he remarked to Meehan.

"If I was making as much money I'd get fat too," Meehan remarked as he glanced into the store. He had seen the proprietor of the place only a few days ago and he was then only moderately stout.

The two policemen passed on, thinking no more of the incident, until a little later they saw the two "fat" men come out of the place and walk with much difficulty up Second Avenue. Finally the situation dawned on the policemen.

"Those are not fat men; they're thieves," Maher said, and without more talk he and his companion gave chase. He was right. The men were thieves and had adopted a novel method of looting the place, depending upon their nerve and boldness to get away. They had started in with suits that fitted them, and then, by putting on slightly increasing sizes built themselves up until each had five complete suits, three overcoats, and pockets full of sundries.

Their efforts to run were amusing. They were as helpless as if encased in ancient armor. The men are naturally thin, and their rather drawn and pale faces made their contrasting bulk of body ludicrous. They were easily taken and proved to be Thomas Brady, twenty years old, of 142 Canal Street, and Edward Remington of 172 East One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Street, Brady's father-in-law. They are not unknown to the police.

The same store was robbed several months ago and the police believe the same men committed that crime.

Held for Mr. Perrenoud's Death.

Moses Klenert, twenty-two years old, of 1,685 First Avenue, driver of the horse and wagon which knocked down and killed Gustav F. Perrenoud of 697 West End Avenue Saturday night at One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street and Seventh Avenue, was remanded to the Coroner when arraigned in the Harlem Police Court yesterday morning before Magistrate Crane on a charge of homicide. Louis Lipman, twenty-five years old of 533 East Eighty-eighth Street, who was in the wagon with Klenert, was remanded to the Coroner as a witness.

Mr. Perrenoud's body has been taken to an undertaking establishment, where it will remain until instructions have been received from the dead man's sister, who is in Denver, Col. Mr. Perrenoud was a prominent member of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club.

CIGARS-CIGAR LEAF INDUSTRY.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES

By ISMAR S. ELLISON,

Editor The United States Tobacco Journal.

The prospects of the tobacco trade and industries for 1900 are brighter than they have been for many years past.

To judge from the increase in the production of our cigar industry since the close of our last fiscal year, on June 30, 1899, the output of cigars will exceed at least 800,000,000, bringing the total at the close of the fiscal year of 1900 up to the figure of 5,300,000,000, the largest figure ever reached. In this unprecedented production of cigars is not included the output of the so-called little cigars, which have become a feature of the industry since the war tax left them unmolested in the general raise on the products of tobacco. Since then their production has been increasing steadily, until they have reached an average output of 70,000,000 per month, with the prospect of a further advance to 100,000,000 a month during the coming year.

The phenomenal productions of cigars, both of those that pay the $3.60 tax and of those that pay only the $1 tax, naturally reflects most favorably on the condition of the cigar leaf market. Never before in the history of the cigar leaf market has a year opened with so little raw leaf in stock of first hands as does 1900, and with very rare exceptions have the tobacco growers been able to dispose so speedily and advantageously of their crops, which become marketable only the following midsummer and the beginning of the Fall, as they did their 1899 crops.

The farmer will receive the money for his crops in January and February, but it is hard to tell now whether the packer who bought it made a profitable investment. At any rate even if the tobacco turns out perfectly sound and satisfactory, there will not be more than a banker's commission in it for the packer because, on the one hand, the farmer was quick enough to take advantage of the favorable situation and to raise the price of his product far above its actual value, while, on the other hand, the manufacturer cannot meet a proportionate profit on this inordinate advance on account of the stability and custom-sanctioned price for which a cigar sells to the consumer.

Besides, everything else that enters into the make-up of a cigar has advanced in price—boxes, labels, wages, &c. Furthermore, the manufacturer will have to meet the considerable advance in the price of the Cuban leaf, as there will be for the year only one-quarter of the supply that is actually needed for our cigar industry, and he will also have to pay a higher price for that ideal leaf for wrapper purposes, the Sumatra, because the old stock is well nigh exhausted, and there is no other leaf that can replace its attractiveness and usefulness. Thus, while the year promises greater activity and a largely expanded trade, there are some drawbacks in the bright prospects, namely: the high prices of the raw material, its presumable shortage, the scarcity of labor for the factories, and the small profits for the manufacturer as well as the packer. AUTOMOBILES AND INSANITY.

Omaha Student's Strange Bombardment and Ideas Cause His Arrest.

George L. Burgess, thirty years old, a student, of 2,227 Dodge Street, Omaha, Neb., living for a week past at the Manhattan Hotel, Madison Avenue and Forty-second Street, was taken to the insane pavilion at Bellevue Hospital last night and held for examination as to his mental condition.

Bicycle Policeman Timothy Sullivan found Burgess at Fifth Avenue and Forty-sixth Street with an armful of beer glasses, which he took delight in hurling at every automobile that rolled by. He narrowly missed hitting one woman in the head. When the policeman arrested him he protested that he was violating no law. He said he had a right to throw beer glasses.

"Who has the right of way?" he demanded. "Who was here first? Men or automobiles?"

The policeman, when he questioned Burgess at length, concluded he had a madman to deal with.

He sent a call for an ambulance to Flower Hospital, and Dr. Daniels answered it. He agreed with the policeman that Burgess was demented. He took him directly to Bellevue.

On the way to the hospital Burgess said he knew William Jennings Bryan very well and had written several letters to him since coming to town.

A letter was found in one pocket of the man's coat on which was written, "I walked up Fifth Avenue, but did not notice a bridge until I got to Sixty-seventh Street." Burgess was well dressed and had over $40 in his pockets. Burgess says he is a law student.

THE MANCHESTER MARKET.

MANCHESTER, Dec. 31.—The market during the last fortnight was quiet, with a strong undertone. Business was limited. The smaller foreign markets were fair buyers. Values are now at the highest point reached this year, a point where China and Calcutta buyers cannot follow in any quantity, while Bombay is crippled by a famine more serious than had hitherto been believed.

The year just closed has been the most prosperous of the last twenty-five for the spinning companies in the Oldham district, which have earned, on the average, more than ten per cent. on their capital, the average profit per company being £4,406. The nearest approach to this was in 1890, when the average profit was £4,177.

The Continental manufacturing centres are very busy, particularly Rouen, which closes the year amid quite exceptional prosperity.

FOURTEEN PAGES with THIRTY-TWO PAGE ANNUAL FINANCIAL REVIEW.

A WONDERFUL YEAR.

The year 1899 was a year of wonders, a veritable annus mirabilis, in business and production. To paraphrase a celebrated epitaph, prosperity left scarcely any of our industries untouched, and touched nothing it did not enrich. It would be easy and natural to speak of the twelve months just past as the banner year were we not already confident that the distinction of highest records must presently pass to the year 1900.

The story of the Nation's material progress as it is told in The Financial Supplement of THE TIMES this New Year's morning is of a nature to appeal to the most ethereal mind and stir the most sluggish imagination. The man whose aspiring soul has prompted him to resolve, with GOETHE, to live resolutely for the Good, the True, and the Perfect may be indifferent to the statistics of the great corn crop in Kansas, to the unprecedented prosperity of the iron and steel trade, and to the ninety-three billions of bank clearings that tell of the vast volume of the country's business for the year. But the finest flower that grows must strike its roots in material earth. And the mines that give up their treasures, the looms and mills that impress utility and value upon crude products, the rushing trains and steamships that enable communities to share and contribute to the world's exchangeable surplus of commodities, the industrious banker, sitting on his aggregated deposits and paying them out upon carefully scrutinized vouchers, even the loud resounding broker upon the floor of the Exchange, fixing investment values by his vociferous wagers—all these help to lay the enduring foundation of the Nation's wealth upon which depends its capacity to produce and enjoy the fine things of life, in arts and letters, in science and learning, and the highest social enjoyments. The noble products of civilization spring from organized and intelligently directed industry. When men lived in caves and every head of a family had to kill his own bear or go without meat there were no Doric temples, no Trajan columns, or Dewey arches, and no poets reciting their verses to the crowds of a Summer evening.

We sold and exported $1,252,500,000 worth of our domestic products, and our total export and import trade for the first time exceeded two billions. In the total of the exports, manufactures appear to the value of $375,000,000, an increase of $68,000,000 over 1898.

We raised nearly two and one-half billions of bushels of corn, of which the average price was three cents per bushel higher than last year. We raised 547,000,000 bushels of wheat and 9,000,000 bales of cotton.

There were shipped from the mines 47,250000 tons of anthracite coal, the largest production in our history. The production of bituminous coal is estimated at 190,000,000 tons. In a closely related branch of industry, the iron trade, we find our iron furnaces turning out 295,000 tons of pig iron a day, as against 225,000 a year ago, and prices of iron and steel are double what they were then. We export four times as much iron and steel as we did ten years ago, and import one-fourth as much.

The aggregate bank clearings of the year were $93,000,000,000, an increase of 37 per cent. over the record of 1898. What a tremendous volume of business these figures represent!

There was a great deal of buying and selling of securities. Upon the New York Stock Exchange 172,000,000 shares were sold, and the bond transactions reached a total, at par value, of more than $820,000,000.

There were a great many new corporations organized. If we take into account only those which interest the Wall Street public, their aggregate capitalization reaches over four billions—and some of it is cash. The so-called industrials account, of course, for a good part of the new share capitalization, but much of it is industrial in quite another sense.

The columns of The Supplement contain a list of more than fifty companies that declared their first dividend last year; of a score that increased their rate of dividend, and of thirty that made extra dividend payments to their stockholders.

In the past we have looked successively to the years 1880 and 1890 as measures of what the country could do in years of great prosperity. We must advance now nearly another decade to 1899 as a record year, and in many if not most respects even those great totals are likely to be surpassed by the year upon which we now enter.

THE OUTLOOK.

Unquestionably to the great body of business men the outlook on the threshold of the new year is extremely bright. It is shown in nearly every line of the contributions from able and experienced observers which make up the Financial Supplement of THE TIMES this morning. Their tone is uniformly hopeful and confident. There are substantial reasons for this.

1. It is plain that we have not nearly exhausted the effect of the general demand created by the enforced economy of the immediate past. The country is yet steadily engaged in repairing the loss of tissue suffered during the "lean years." It is making up through all its vast frame for the low diet, insufficient nourishment, and checked growth that were inflicted on it for some five years previous to 1897. The process is strikingly shown in the enormous expenditures of the transportation lines for improvements in every direction, while new railroad building is practically at a standstill. Probably no other one element in the situation has contributed more to the wonderful general activity of the past year. It illustrates in a marked manner the existence of a force that may be relied on to work substantially unabated during the coming year.

2. In addition to this influence there is that of an extended foreign trade. So far as this depends on the demand for our food products and our ability to supply it, no sure prediction can be made at this time. But during the past two years, and especially in the last year, we have developed great growth in our capacity to furnish the markets of the world with the products, not of the soil, but of industry in great and constantly increasing variety. This has been due in part to the lower prices resulting from long depression and the saving in every way thereby compelled, but it has also in great part been due to the rapid and almost uniform advance made in recent years in invention and in improvement of processes in the United States, and in the minute, accurate, and efficient organization of industry. So great has this advance been that it is a commonplace in manufacturing with us that we can supply practically "from stock" a large part of the goods that in other countries must be made to order. This has been shown in a number of large contracts taken in the United States for important work, such as the Atbara bridge, where time was absolutely essential, and won the competition. Sure and rapid improvement in every direction is now so assumed in all large business plants that the life of expensive machinery is computed not on the basis of when it will wear out, but of when it will be out of date. This tendency to advance is stimulated by the constantly broadening competition that the world's markets require.

3. One most valuable basis of confidence in the immediate future is the practical disappearance of the issue of silver inflation and repudiation from our National politics, and the certainty that the gold standard will be declared and its maintenance provided for by the present Congress. The immense importance of this fact can be appreciated if we look back four years and ask ourselves what would be the prospect if we were about to enter another Presidential campaign next Summer with the value of all the property and the soundness of all credit in the United States dependent on the result. It would then be a question, not of what profit could be made in the next year, but only of how much could be saved from impending disaster. As it is, the country will enter on the last year of the century with its public credit and its currency in a sounder condition than it has known in nearly forty years. It is an immense advantage, and the safety of multitudes depends on it who do not at all realize its worth.

There is, however, another side to the question of even the immediate future and business men who are at once prudent and honest will not shut their eyes to it. It will be seen to have found recognition from several of those that have contributed to the Financial Supplement. The rapid advance in prices—such as 50 per cent. in fuel and 100 per cent. in iron and steel—within the past year must tend to check trade if it is long continued, and this is especially true as to foreign trade, in which the field of competition is so extended. On the other hand this advance tends to stimulate production and the extension of plants, with the conversion of available into fixed capital. This is a constantly recurring cycle of change that seems to depend on the continuous forces of human nature. If it is accompanied by undue inflation of credit, as it almost inevitably is, the time arrives when production is greater than can be disposed of at a profit, when more or less forced sales start the reduction of prices, when fixed charges are met with progressive difficulty, and the shrinking of too extended credit compels readjustment and threatens disturbance and even panic. It is the judgment of the best observers that there is no probability that the next year will see even the beginning of such reaction, and that on the contrary it will be a year of continued and increasing activity and prosperity. Yet it is the experience of the modern world that the longer the period of uninterrupted prosperity and activity the surer is the ultimate arrival of the reaction. The excessive and excited speculation on the Stock Exchange of the early part of the last year and the sharp check administered in its closing weeks are events that have their lesson. It is not likely to be heeded by "the general public," to whom its significance is as obscure as it is unwelcome, but it may well be heeded by those whose course can measurably control the credit that is the essential condition of speculation. The more firmly and wisely this is done, the more steady and secure will be the development of what is roughly but justly called "legitimate business."

FINANCES OF THE NEW POSSESSIONS.

No better subject of study could have been selected by the American Economic Association than the financial policy suited to our new possessions, and the report of the committee of the association will doubtless be considered carefully at Washington.

There are three main points in it. All have practically the same purpose and relate to the essential condition of real success in the administration of the colonies. First, the revenues derived from the colonies should be devoted to the use and benefit of those who pay them—to the colonies themselves. Practically there will be little temptation for the United States to transgress this principle. The necessities of any of our new colonies will for a long time be great enough to absorb all the taxes that can in reason or with any hope of a return be levied in them. But the principle is important because if it be thoroughly and consistently followed it will tend to attach the people to the American system and to strengthen the desire and the capacity for self-government.

Second, where there is any chance to develop external trade the duties levied on it should be very light and designed for revenue only. Though this is contrary to the protection idea, it will hardly be opposed even by the protectionists, since the United States will be so situated as to take a large share of this trade. And in this case, as in the other, freedom to develop their own resources is the prime condition of prosperity and contentment in the colonies. That is worth far more than any exclusive privileges that we could possibly secure or impose.

Third, the natives should be given as large a share as practicable in the administration, with the clear understanding that the agents of the United States shall have the final control, and these agents should be chosen solely with reference to their ability and character. Any departure from this principle will be perilous and costly. Spain has given the natives a terrible experience of the spoils system and a deep-seated detestation of it. It is our highest interest and our plain duty to give them the opposite. It will be infinitely better for them and cheaper for us. Justice and honesty will be found a good deal less costly and more efficient than rifles and rapid-firing guns.

TUNNELS AND BRIDGES.

It is hard to have to say anything in favor of the Municipal Assembly, as at present constituted. Controller COLER has been maintaining, with much plausibility, that the only method of converting that body into even a harmless adjunct to the Municipal Government was to abolish it entirely. We have agreed with the Controller in this conclusion. We have even anticipated him in reaching it. But we are sure the Controller will agree with us that, for once in its existence, the Board of Aldermen has served a good public purpose. It has "held up" the bridge across Blackwell's Island from Sixtieth Street to Long Island City. The Controller is especially bound to approve its action in this matter. He was the champion of the public against the Mayor in the Board of Estimate, when the Mayor cut so very poor a figure. The Controller pointed out that there was no public urgency about the construction of this bridge and the other bridge, the fortunes of which were linked with it, that we should at once strip ourselves of our debt-incurring capacity in their behalf. He pointed out also that there was probable cause to believe that the object the two bridges were expected to attain could be equally well attained by tunnels which would not cost a quarter as much, and upon this point he brought expert authority to prove his case. At the very least, he made out a conclusive case for delay and for investigation, and a probable case for tunnels as against bridges. In answer to his arguments and his evidence, the Mayor had nothing better to offer than a coarse imputation upon the Controller's motives, an imputation in which it is safe to say that the Mayor had no more real belief than any other citizen.

It is this discreditable behavior of the Mayor which the Board of Aldermen has prevented from taking effect. All our schemes of municipal reform for a good many years have proceeded upon the assumption that any man whom his fellow-citizens would elect Mayor would have more sensitiveness to public opinion, more sense of responsibility, and more powerful motives generally constraining him to do the right thing than would have the majority of a municipal legislature, which could divide among themselves the responsibility for any iniquitous action until the individual share of each could be easily borne.

This presumption has failed in this case, not because the local legislature is any better than the theorists expected it would be, but because the Mayor has not been anything like so good. The Mayor had nothing better to say for his position on this question than abuse for the Controller.

The adherents of the Mayor in the Board of Aldermen have had nothing better to say for the project than to predict that, if Tammany did not build the thirty millions' worth of bridges and enjoy the patronage which came from the spending of that amount of money, the Republicans at Albany would. A question of public improvement was never publicly put upon a lower plane of discussion. Those who put it there showed that what they were concerned about was not the satisfaction of a public need, but the political pickings that would accrue from the prosecution of a big job. And the pioneer in this scandalous demonstration was the Mayor of New York. It was reserved for Mr. VAN WYCK to show that even such a municipal legislature as we have may be a useful check upon the schemes of such a Mayor as himself. If this showing is unpleasant to the Mayor, it is certain that he has nobody but himself to blame.

BOSTON STANDS WITH THE COUNTRY.

In his speech at Cooper Union, replying to GAMALIEL BRADFORD, Prof. GROSVENOR of Amherst College declared that the people of Boston, as a whole, were in full accord with the sentiment of the country in respect to the policy of expansion. Some of the most prominent anti-imperialists live there, he said, but they are very much in the minority.

There is not the slightest doubt of it. We are confident that there is no community in this land, no matter how backward and ill-informed, no matter how out of touch with National sentiment, where the anti-imperialists will be found in the majority. For anti-imperialism, as it is preached and practiced by the Boston sect, opposes not only the war we are waging against the Filipino rebels, but insists that we ought to scuttle out of the Philippines forthwith, leaving the natives to cut each others' throats in peace. Communities are too sane to fall into such baneful errors. It is only the individual mind that aberrancy thus bits and rides.

The claim of the English owners of the Manila-Dagupan Railway to damages for losses incident to the war affords a good illustration of the liabilities we should incur if we shirked our National obligations in the Philippines. We may be liable to damages to the owners of this railway even though we have used due diligence to put down the insurgents. We should be liable to every property owner in the islands who was plundered by the Tagals if we ran away and left them to work their gentle will upon every inhabitant who has failed to sympathize with them.

Boston is inhabited by Americans who think and feel in an American way. The Aguinaldists are probably not more numerous there in proportion to population than they are in other communities. They are only noisier and run more printing presses.

THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL REVIEW.

The New Year's offering of THE TIMES to its readers to-day is its Annual Financial Review, and we may say with candor that it is no mean gift. In the extent, variety, authority, interest, and value of its contents it has never been equaled by any like publication. In its thirty-two pages it presents minute and accurate statistics of every security dealt in on the Stock Exchange. It also offers reviews of the situation in various important branches and of the general situation, industrial and financial, by writers of especial experience and standing, together with opinions and estimates as to the future. These include the President of the New York Clearing House, the Secretary of the Treasury, experts in the iron, metal mining, grain, coal, and other trades, in foreign exports, and representatives of the great railroad lines.

There are also contributions from foreign sources, while the retrospect and forecast of trade conditions throughout the world by our London Financial Correspondent has the interest and value that his long experience, tried ability, and high reputation give.

It has been the aim of THE TIMES to secure entire trustworthiness in every statement of fact, and the highest attainable authority for all statements of opinion. We believe that we have had a most unusual degree of success, and that The Review published with our regular edition at the price of one cent is a remarkable achievement in the making of newspapers. While we are not without pride in it, we may say that it is a purely business enterprise; that it meets a real demand, and amply satisfies it.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

—An illustration at once amusing and pathetic of the difficulties which reputable and well-meaning people often feel obliged to put in the way of philanthropists with whose aims they thoroughly sympathize, is to be found in the particularly painful situation just created by Mrs. BALLINGTON BOOTH at Flushing, L. I. Mrs. BOOTH'S work among convicts and ex-convicts has won no less admiration in Flushing than elsewhere, and like all the rest of us, the residents of that suburb are more than willing to admit, indeed, they are eager to assert, that it is desirable to have some place where released prisoners can remain under good influences while making the necessary arrangements for entering once more upon an honest and industrious life. But the plan so pleasant in the abstract lost all its attractiveness—for the Flushingites—when Mrs. BOOTH bought some land in the best part of their town and prepared to erect there an asylum for her repentant charges. Instantly Flushing lost all its enthusiasm for the reformation of convicts; at any rate, its inhabitants instantly began to consider ways and means for preventing the threatened addition to their numbers. They still declare that a home of the kind planned by Mrs. BOOTH would be a most excellent thing, and they offer to give generous assistance in its establishment, but—they are convinced that it should be somewhere else than in their own immediate neighborhood. The knotty, the insoluble, problem is, Where? Every other town as well adapted as Flushing for providing a site for such an institution would have objections equally strong, and if the poor convicts wait for an invitation they are likely to wait forever.

—No wonder the Britishers are saying unkind things about Lord METHUEN'S vocabulary. "Rude" is a word good enough in its way, but when applied by a defeated General to his victorious opponent it excites, not indignation against the latter, but laughter at the former. And the laughter is not of a pleasant kind, for it expresses more contempt than amusement, and comes rather from enemies than from friends. CRONJE has been "rude" to his noble foe in more respects than one, but Lord METHUEN should prove himself something else than polite before he raises the question of manners. As between a courteous General who loses and a boorish—and Boerish—one who wins, critics military or militant will find the choice ridiculously easy. Trouble of a more serious, but not on that account necessarily more dangerous, sort has arisen from the amazing proclamation addressed by the English commander at Mafeking, Col. BADEN-POWELL, to the bughers who are holding him very effectively and severely besieged. At the time of this officer's appointment to an important post at the front doubts of his ability and discretion were freely expressed in London, and now he has been at great pains to justify those doubts by treating the Boers as though they were savages, ignorant, and childish, to whom it was safe and profitable to tell any tales, no matter how inaccurate, about the nations of Europe and America. Owing to the fact that just at present the most convenient way to manifest hatred for the English is to show fervent friendship for the Boers, the latter are kept well posted on foreign politics and events by industrious and able correspondents, and Col. BADEN-POWELL'S ghost stories about sympathies and alliances were therefore carried to a ludicrously poor market. To underestimate an enemy's knowledge and strength are fatal errors, and the carpet knight at Mafeking seems to have more than his share of talent for this kind of blundering.

—A valued correspondent calls our attention to the fact that of the forty-two decisions handed down on Thursday last by the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court, twenty-three were reversals of the lower courts, and only nineteen were affirmations. This is indeed a lamentable showing, and makes inevitable the conclusion that somewhere in our judicial system there is something radically wrong. Our correspondent calls it "a shameful insult" that in over 50 per cent. of these cases it should be necessary to impose upon the litigants the expense and inconvenience of new trials. "Consider," he writes, "the waste of time of Judges, jurors, parties, witnesses, court officers, clerks of courts, and of the attorneys on either side. Consider, also, the wicked waste of money for the new work to be done on new trials or further appeals, and the disappointments, not to say perjuries, involved in double trials when the appeal goes off on facts admitted or denied in the lower courts. And remember that all this is in the face of the maxim that 'it is in the interest of the Republic that litigations should cease.'" Our correspondent closes with the assertion that "of course, the consequence of this is contempt for the law and its ministers." That is going rather far. However justifiable or explicable such contempt might be, little or none of it exists in the mind of the average man. Even the often expressed distrust of lawyers has too large an element of humor to be sincere, and our Judges are generally regarded and always treated with respect. But though the situation is by no means desperate, its improvement is none the less desirable, and the broad and constant stream of reversals should not be allowed to flow on unheeded.

Just One Experience.

"This beautiful pipe was given me for Christmas," said the grave-looking man to the department store clerk. "I believe it was purchased here. May I exchange it for a badly needed pair of shoes?"—Philadelphia North American.

Comes Home to Him.

"It is sad," said the man who follows the news closely, "that the new year should begin amid war and turmoil."
"Yes," replied Hardhit, "but these bill collectors ought to understand that a man can't settle so soon after Christmas."—Philadelphia North American.

Joke on the Other Fellow.

His Mother (to wife going through the pockets of her husband's clothing)—I wouldn't do that, Irene. Come, now, do you think it is right?

THE SEA IS THINE, AND THOU MADEST IT.

William H. Dall in Christian Register.

Lord of the vast inconstant sea,
Lord of its creatures, great and small,
Thy steadfast arm unceasingly
With loving-kindness keepeth all.

Thine are the isles embowered in palm,
Ring-girt with snow-white coral sand,
Scenting with aromatic balm
The trade-wind traversing the land,

Where mirrored in the still lagoon
The coco and pandanus rise,
And, driven by the strong monsoon,
The leaping breaker smites, and dies.

The ceaseless challenge of the seas
Thy reefs, impregnable, defy;
Safely defended, thus at ease
Sunlit, thy peaceful atolls lie.

Thine are the islands of the north,
Mantled with sombre spruce and pine,
Whose rocky buttresses jut forth
Into the chill and seething brine.

There dripping rockweed lifts and falls
In cadence, as the surges beat,
Resounding, where the sea-gull calls,
And beetling cliff and shingle meet.

Thy flowing tide across the straits
With rippled front makes good its way,
And, while the eager salmon waits,
Unlocks the shallows of the bay.

Or, where the blue and splintered wall
Of glacier-foot defends the shore,
The ice-front topples to its fall,
The black cliffs echoing its roar.

Forth on the bosom of the tide,
Out to the eddies of the sea,
Majestical, the icebergs ride
Toward transformations yet to be.

Out by the reefs where otters slept
By rocks where herded walrus groan,
Where the Great Auk aforetime kept,
Last of the race, her watch alone;

Into the immemorial deep
They pass, and vanish, dropping slow
Their harvest, garnered on the steep,
Into the silent depths below.

And still thy steady tides flow on,
Responsive to the whirling spheres
Celestian; and their courses run
Through the innumerable years.

Food for thy creatures small and great
In every clime they surely bear;
However paltry its estate,
To each one its appointed share.

Duly thy boundaries are set
For all thy broad unfathomed seas,
Nor may the towering surge forget
The smallest of thy mysteries.

Lord of the breaker and the reef,
Lord of the wide abysmal main,
We read thee in each rustling leaf,
Each atom from the dusty plain.

Thy wondrous artifice we know
In all thy handiwork to be:
Yet, above all, thy glories show
Supreme in thine eternal sea.
Bering Sea, July, 1899.

FRENCH OPPOSE RECIPROCITY.

Stiff Campaign to be Inaugurated Against the Treaty Recently Negotiated.

PARIS, Dec. 31.—A stiff campaign against the Franco-American commercial treaty is about to be opened by the Parliamentary Opposition to the Government and by the agriculturists. Despite the favorable report of the Customs Committee, a hostile current has become manifest among the Deputies who represent the agricultural constituencies, as well as those who sit for certain industrial centres, against several clauses of the treaty.

A majority of the agricultural associations have protested against granting the United States the minimum tariff, while manufacturers of farming implements, cycles, and machine wools are deeply disturbed over the advantages accorded to their American competitors by the treaty. This anxiety is shared by the oil seed industry.

The outcome of this feeling is a motion to be submitted to the Chamber of Deputies by members specially interested for the postponement of ratification until the alleged objectionable clauses have been eliminated or modified. M. Emile Chevallier, Deputy for Beauvais, one of the supporters of the motion, said, in the course of an interview to-day, that by consenting to a reduction of the duties on vegetable oils, the advocates of the treaty were seriously injuring the whole body of agriculturists, particularly those in Picardy and Normandy, where colza is an important product. The Deputy declared that a reduction of protective duties by 75 per cent. meant a hard blow to thousands of French farmers.

M. Destournelles, one of whose hobbies it is to point out the "American peril," said: "More than ever do I see a danger to Europe in the extensive industrial development of the United States. More than ever do I fear the American peril and the yellow peril. However, I do not consider the erection of a protection barrier to be the best dike against inundation by American products. We would make a more effective resistance by improving our national production and organizing it on better lines."

QUEEN'S NEW YEAR'S HONORS.

Only Three Subjects of Great Britain Elevated to the Peerage.

LONDON, Jan. 1.—The Queen's list of New Year honors, published last evening, shows fewer names than usual. Sir John Lubbock and Sir Henry Stafford Northcote, Governor of Bombay, are created peers.

Baron Cromer, British Diplomatic Agent in Egypt; Lord Montagu Rowton, and Mr. William Wither Bramston Beach, Conservative Member for the Andover Division of Hants, the Commoner who has seen the longest service, are appointed members of the Privy Council.

Mr. Charles Norton Eliot, the British member of the Samoan High Commission, is appointed Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George.

Naval Captains Stuart and Sturdee are designated Companions of St. Michael and St. George for their services in Samoa.

Messrs. George Buchanan and H. Cunnygham are made Companions of the Bath in recognition of their services in connection with the Venezuelan Boundary Arbitration Commission.

Capt. William de Wiveleslie Abney, Principal Assistant Secretary of the Science and Art Department, is designated a Knight Commander of the Bath.

Among the new knights is Dr. Thomas Lauder Brunton, physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

GERMAN LINER AFLOAT AGAIN.

The Pelotas Hauled Off by Five Tugs and Is Towed to Rotterdam.

LONDON, Dec. 31.—The Hamburg and South American Line steamer Pelotas, from Santos for Rotterdam, which went ashore near Dungeness Friday night during a heavy storm, was drawn off about ten o'clock this morning by five tugs.

Apparently the vessel has not received serious injuries. She proceeded for Rotterdam in tow of two tugs.

POLITICAL PRISONERS FREED.

King Humbert of Italy Proclaims an Amnesty.

ROME, Dec. 31.—King Humbert to-day proclaimed amnesty for all persons convicted of or charged with crimes against the public security and the freedom of labor, as well as political press offenses.

This implies a pardon for those punished for participating in the riots that startled Italy during the early part of the year.

FRENCH STRIKE MORE HOPEFUL.

Belief Expressed That Arbitration Will Prove Successful.

ST. ETIENNE, France, Dec. 31.—Despite the extensive shutting down of the iron works and factories in this locality, owing to the shortage of coal, the situation to-day is improved, in consequence of the joint decision to arbitrate. M. Jaures, the Socialist, who will act for the strikers in the arbitration, arrived here this afternoon to meet the representative of the mine owners.

A hopeful feeling now prevails that the dispute will be settled amicably and without further delay.

The lace workers have also agreed to arbitration.

M. GUERIN BECOMES ABUSIVE.

Alleged French Conspirator Denounces His Accusers.

PARIS, Dec. 31.—The Senate, sitting as the High Court for the trial of the conspiracy charges, was in session to-day, in order to hasten the conclusion of the proceedings. A sensational incident occurred at the opening, when a spectator suddenly fell dead in the Public Gallery.

The session was chiefly devoted to a speech by M. Jules Guerin in his own defense. He vigorously attacked Senators and the Public Prosecutor, and was becoming abusive when he received a sharp caution from M. Fallieres, President of the Court, who warned him to moderate his language under peril of being refused a further hearing. He then proceeded, until adjournment, with an elaborate repudiation of the accusations against him.

GERMAN PEOPLE ARE HOAXED.

Spurious Manifesto by the Czar Distributed in Berlin.

BERLIN, Dec. 31.—The Vorwaerts to-day published the alleged text of a new manifesto from Emperor Nicholas against the increase of naval armaments, which it is said he will promulgate on the first day of the Russian new year. The Vorwaerts's publication represents the Czar as convening another international conference to consider this particular question.

The general public appears to have accepted the manifesto as genuine; but, on inquiry at the Foreign Office, it was ascertained that the manifesto is bogus. From other sources, usually well informed, a correspondent learned that the Vorwaerts meant the whole thing as a hoax and as an ironical reprimand for the Government.

To Marry Herr Stollwerck's Daughter.

BERLIN, Dec. 31.—Count Arthur von Bornstorff, who, four years ago came near marrying one of the Barrison sisters of vaudeville fame, has just become betrothed to the daughter of a wealthy manufacturer, Herr Stollwerck, who has made a fortune in chocolate at Cologne.

More North German Lloyd Steamers.

BERLIN, Dec. 31.—The North German Lloyd Steamship Company has ordered a number of new steamers, and is raising its ocean fleet to ninety-five vessels, the largest number under the control of any company in the world.

"Instantaneous Marriages" Cease.

BERLIN, Dec. 31.—To-day terminates the privilege hitherto enjoyed by Heligoland enabling "instantaneous marriages" to be performed on the island. The last seven couples thus united have just returned.

Emperor William Ailing Again.

BERLIN, Dec. 31.—Emperor William, during the week, has suffered somewhat from his oldtime ear affection.

THIS WEEK IN CONGRESS

The Financial Bill to be Taken Up by the Senate.

QUAY CASE ALSO IN PROSPECT

Expected the Latter Will Occupy the Most Attention—Discussion of the Philippines Likely.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31.—Congress will resume its sittings Wednesday. The chief interest this week will be in the Senate, where the financial bill will come up for consideration.

In the absence of Senator Aldrich, Chairman of the Committee on Finance, who will have charge of the financial bill, no definite statement can be made as to how vigorously he will press that measure at the beginning of the business, but there is no doubt of his general determination to push it along as rapidly as possible after the present week. He has given notice that he will call the measure up on Thursday, and it is generally believed that he will then, or on the following day, make a statement in support of it.

It is the purpose of the supporters of the bill to make very few speeches, leaving the opposition to do the greater share of the talking, while its opponents, on the other hand, will use every endeavor to draw the friends of the bill into running debate.

There is no present purpose on the part of the opposition to delay the passage of the bill unnecessarily, and likewise none on the part of its supporters to press the measure to the personal inconvenience of opposing Senators. Those Senators who are antagonistic to the bill as a rule freely confess their inability to defeat it, saying that it will get practically the entire Republican vote if needed, and probably one or two Democratic votes. With a session of unlimited duration before them, they cannot hope to conduct a successful filibuster. Hence they will not seek to delay the measure beyond the time necessary to discuss its provisions and give the country the benefit of their analysis of its provisions. How long it may take them to do this will depend largely upon the length of the daily sessions and the freedom from interruptions by other business.

At present there is but one matter which threatens to interfere with the continuity of the progress on the financial bill. That is the right of Senator Quay to a seat in the Senate. Senator Chandler, Chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, has stated that a report will be made in the Quay case soon after the beginning of business. It now seems probable that there will be more debate over the Quay contest than over the financial measure. Up to date not more than half a dozen Senators have announced a purpose to make set financial speeches, while the probabilities are that the Quay case will call out much animated discussion.

It will be difficult to hold the discussion of foreign questions, especially the Philippine subject, in check during the financial discussion. Many of the Southern Senators are anxious to bring the Philippine question to the front, and it may be safely predicted that there will be more or less reference to it from the beginning. There will be an early effort to get up the Samoan treaty, and it may furnish a basis for discussion of the foreign policy if one is not found before the treaty is considered. During the present week the foundations of the financial discussion will be laid, and it doubtless will reveal much of the plans of both sides to the controversy. There will be a strenuous effort to pass the bill without amendment, but the opposition will insist upon votes on innumerable propositions, and on some of these they may get the support of some Senators known to have pro-silver leanings.

The week in the House does not give promise of much business. The committees have not yet begun active work, and there has not been any legislation of pressing importance reported. The Appropriations Committee has not yet considered the urgent Deficiency bill, although the measure has been prepared. This bill may be brought in during the week if there should be a request from the executive departments asking for its early passage. As the bill will carry nearly $50,000,000 for the army, most of which is on account of the Philippines, it is quite likely there will be considerable discussion of the Philippine policy while the measure is before the House. There are some minor matters, such as provision for clerks, and routine management of House affairs that are to be passed upon.

THE SHANGHAI CONCESSIONS.

United States, Great Britain, and France Reach a Satisfactory Agreement as to Extensions.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31.—The announcement that the extension of the foreign concessions at Shanghai, China, has been finally approved brings to a close a diplomatic controversy between Great Britain, the United States, and France, which has at times become rather acute, France taking the position at one stage of the negotiations that the American co-operation with the British in opposing the French plans of extension was an unfriendly act toward France. This, and the other differences, have been happily adjusted, according to announcements from China which are borne out by the information of officials here.

The controversy assumed an international scope when the three colonies at Shanghai—British, French, and American—sought to extend their limits. The concessions are just outside of the old native city, and lie along the River Whang Poo, near the point where it joins the Yang-Tze-Kiang. They are chiefly important because Shanghai is the foremost port of entry for foreign trade in the Chinese Empire. The French settlement is nearest the city, and fronts on the river. Next comes the British settlement, and then the American. The French desire was to extend their settlement so as to take in a large area back of the old city, including five American missionary institutions. The British Government opposed this extension quite vigorously. The British plan of extension was for an "international settlement," running from the rear of the British concession up to the native city. France in turn protested against this on the ground that she would be entirely surrounded, without exit, except by the river, the native city, or over British territory. The United States approved the plan of an international settlement, as the American interests were substantially similar to those of the British, but the American attitude did not include an indorsement of all the concessions made by the British. It was to this course of the American Government that France took exception, on the ground that it was an unfriendly act to France. The negotiations, while assuming no outward show of warmth, were carried on with some briskness, Ambassador Cambon of France presenting the French side up to a few months ago.

The adjustment finally reached is satisfactory to all parties concerned. The French concession is extended, without including the American missions. The British and American settlements are extended, and to some extent merged in the international settlement, but the British-American extension does not so envelop the French colony as to place it in a pocket.

The value of these central concessions is considerable, as the population of Shanghai is about 600,000, of which the greater part is in the foreign settlement. Here the foreigners have the right to carry on trade, and control property, and also have their own courts, police, and an organized military establishment.

National Eisteddfod Exercises.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 31.—The National Eisteddfod, with elaborate programmes of religious, literary, and musical features, began here to-day with a very large attendance. There were religious and musical exercises in Music Hall afternoon and evening. The large stage was filled with singers who rendered Welsh hymns, aided by the vast audience, with fine effect. The competitive musical and literary features will take place to-morrow.

Schooner Carrie T. Hix Wrecked.

GLOUCESTER, Mass., Dec. 31.—The schooner Carrie T. Hix of Rockland, Me., for New York, struck on Dog Bar breakwater this morning while endeavoring to make this harbor. The crew reached shore in safety, despite the intense cold. The Hix will be a total wreck. She is owned by the A. F. Crockett Company and others of Rockland, and is valued at $2,000; uninsured. The cargo of lime is valued at $1,000 and is insured. She is of 147 tons burden and was built in Rockland in 1871.

A CITIZEN'S DUTY IN 1900

Mr. Slicer Denounces Those Who Neglect Political Work.

"Shallow Prayers of Mock Christianity" Far Below the High Call of Citizenship.

The Rev. Thomas R. Slicer preached a sermon for the new year before a large congregation at All Souls' Church (Unitarian) in Fourth Avenue yesterday morning, taking as his text Romans xii., 1, and the CXVI. Psalm. Sharpcott Wensley's "Story of Bethlehem," sung by the full choir, was a special feature of the service.

"In this last day of the year," he said in the beginning, "there is brought to our minds the singular contrast between the conditions which were presented in 1799 and which confront the land to-day. The great first citizen was then being laid to rest, mourned, not so much because he had laid aside the sword forever, as because the representative American could no longer move among the people, showing what this Nation ought to be. They had to learn adjustment to conditions untried which their victories had brought them.

"The Nation has grown great. A hundred things are patent to our eyes that were then hardly guessed. We know things we did not then dream and we have passed through the experiment of statehood and become a missionary Nation among the nations of the earth—not a Nation of missionaries to gild paganism with Christianity, but a Nation conscious of its National destiny, not seeking to work out the new problem of one hundred years ago, but seeking to work it out for others.

"We have taken down our walls. We have extended our limits. We are no longer fortressed by what were then the almost impassable seas, but have made them a pathway over which American warships and merchant ships carry out the mission of this country. The natural inquiry rises in every solicitous mind, 'Where are the Washingtons to make this destiny secure?'

"A good use to be made of the new year is to give it to the readjustment of our mental conditions to the new conditions imposed upon us.

"Of all the material aspects of this age no better illustration serves me at this moment than to carry your minds back to the very first years of this century, when an English traveler limped out of the woods on the margin of Niagara, who had come from Bermuda to see the new Nation and compare it with his birthplace. But the great falls fell into the hands of this country, and were hooked to the traces of unresting progress. They were not simply to pound with their weight of waters into the depths, but were to draw the traffic of a great city near by. Nothing could more clearly contrast with the lonely figure of Tom Moore making a song out of the solitudes of the place.

"It is the renaissance of enterprise. It is the new birth of a strenuous age. This is a good year to adjust ourselves. For myself I believe that it is worth while to use every power that God has given to man either in himself or for himself. We are using but a few of the material forces.

"Suppose that a minister of religion should regard his ministry as an end in itself rather than as a means to an end, the sanctities of worship would be imperiled.

"The world outgrew the God it worshipped two years ago because the universe became in this time by the contributions of philosophy infinitely extended in time and space, and nothing needs doing so much in most men's minds as the readjustment of our devouter natures to the discoveries of our minds. It is an awful thing to find out God's world and to lose God.

"I believe the age is feverish with a desire to readjust itself to the new discoveries of science and the new confusions of the Gospel.

"Where stood twenty-five years ago the word 'materialism' now stands the word 'psychology.' We have passed from the adoration of things to the question whether they are there at all. We have passed through an arid belt of materialistic conclusions based upon the physical discoveries of science to experiment with the soul itself. We have lost our standard of measurements. We must find our way or be left by the march of philosophic thought to the dregs of our ancient superstitions.

"Rouse your consciences to some kind of civic enthusiasm. I cannot well conceive of a more despicable man than one who coins out of the community the means of his living and gives a power of attorney to the lowest man in the community to do his political duty. Think of this man who has but one notion in his mind—the absorbing motion of a sponge! The judges of civic life enter into him, and if he utters them in speech they show but pessimism or cynicism.

"It is time for men and women of New York to have done with this wailing of themselves up in dreams. Nineteen hundred and one will be a date from which the history of this city will be reckoned either in terms of new disgrace or in terms of new achieveent. There is no duty so high as citizenship. The shallow prayers of a mock Christianity cannot be compared to it. Let the task of the coming year, in God's name and by right of your soul, be the readjustment of the whole nature to the year which is new in more ways than the calendar can show, and which is to extend further and larger than any prophesy of ours can now forecast."

Before the benediction the hymn "America" was sung by the whole congregation.

DR. HILLIS ON THE PAST.

Civilization of To-day Represents the Gifts of Yesterday.

"The Flight of the Years—What They Take and What They Bring," was the subject of the sermon of the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, yesterday morning. He said, in part:

"Standing here between the old year and the new, let us dedicate the hour to retrospective and aspiration. The past is valuable alike to the individual and to the race. Indeed, the civilization of to-day does but represent the accumulated treasures of yesterday. Man begins his career an infant, but memory gathers up the experience, the observations, and the reflections of the yesterdays and carries them forward unto today. Enriched thereby, soon the babe stands forth clothed with all the qualities of a patriot or a statesman. Take away his years, and the individual becomes only an infant. Take away the years from society, and for the city we have a group of savages.

"To-day each child is born into the midst of a civilization wonderfully rich. But yesterday gave the youth his language and his laws. Yesterday built the pyramids and the Parthenon. Yesterday fashioned all cathedrals and temples. Yesterday stored the gallery with pictures, the libraries with their books, the factories with their tools. Through our fathers yesterday gave us this new world. Not to-day, but yesterday, subdued the forests, reared the orchards, covered the land with villages and cities. Yesterday gave us the schoolhouse and the church." Yesterday won all the battles for liberty and religion.

"Let us remember that we minister in a temple builded by other hands and hearts.

"The enthusiasm mankind feels toward the patriot or hero, the dignity and majesty that belong to the seer or saint, are also explained by the fact that the past years, with their battles and victories, with their heroisms and self-sacrifices, have lent wisdom and dignity unto each Grant or Garibaldi or Burke.

"As the gardens of Italy have their treasure through the snows and the mineral stimulants that are washed down from the mountain sides, so man's to-days are made rich and deep because many noble thoughts and purposes out of the yesterdays have poured down into his present."

The fiftieth anniversary of the dedication of the present Plymouth Church edifice will be celebrated next Sunday evening.

SKATERS GO THROUGH THE ICE.

Two Men Have a Narrow Escape on the Rahway River.

RAHWAY, N. J., Dec. 31.—Peter Dobbins, who is employed in an office in Wall Street, New York City, and William Housman, a bookbinder of the Mershon Printing Company of this city, narrowly escaped death this afternoon while skating on the Rahway River. Both men are good skaters, but were unaware of the dangerous point where the transord sewer empties into the river. Here the ice was smooth, but the water from the sewer had eaten it away underneath, leaving only a covering.

Dobbins came near going under the solid ice, but Housman clung to the ragged edge until some fence rails were secured. Both were rescued with difficulty and taken to a nearby house, where they were attended.

PROSPERITY IN MINNEAPOLIS.

Large Business Done in the Shops Reflects Good Crops and Demand for Labor.

Special to The New York Times.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Dec. 31.—It is well within the bounds of sober statement to say that the year just ended has been the best that the entire Northwest has ever experienced. The farmers have raised good crops, which they have sold for fair prices; labor has been employed as never before, money is plentiful, and trade in all lines has been of the record-breaking variety.

The improvement was particularly noticeable during the holiday season. In this city and St. Paul the stores were thronged with purchasers from early morning till late at night, and it was a problem for the merchants to wait on everybody. Articles that may be fairly called luxuries were most in demand; even the jewelry stores were crowded, and the purchases there were for the most part expensive. One of the leading dealers in this line of goods reported that his sales of diamonds for a single hour one day just before Christmas amounted to $2,400.

Dealers in the lines of goods that find purchasers among the farmers will close the year's accounts with a handsome balance on the right side of the ledger. Their business for the past year has broken all records. The manager of one of the leading houses in this line is authority for the statement that his firm had, on Dec. 1, $30,000 more in bank than at any time in its previous history, and that its outstanding accounts were proportionately large. Collections, he said, were slow; not on account of a scarcity of money among the farmers, but the reverse. The farmers who had given their notes for machinery were renewing them, and waiting for a rise in the market before selling their wheat, rather than draw the money from the banks and pay their obligations. Under these circumstances, the wholesalers were extending the notes of their country customers, as they were not in need of cash, and the accounts were regarded as perfectly good.

The demand for labor during the whole year has been remarkable. Instead of the streets of the cities being filled with men searching for work, the employment agencies have been offering every possible inducement for men to fill the orders they have received. In Minneapolis and St. Paul it has happened, not once, but dozens of times, that an agency would receive an order for 200 men and not be able to secure twenty. Railroads that were building new lines had to send South for negro laborers. Free fares were offered every one from the Twin Cities to the spot where the work was to be done, and wages ranging from $2 to $2.50 were promised, but the men were not forthcoming. Tramps have become rare in this State, at least, and but few appeals have come to eleemosynary institutions for assistance. Of the small number who have asked for help, a large majority were unable, on account of age or physical infirmity, to perform a day's work.

A conservative estimate of the value of articles manufactured in Minneapolis alone for the year just ended is $154,080,000, an increase of 45 per cent. since 1895. The total bank clearings for the year will exceed $350,000,000, an increase over last year of $85,000,000. The jobbing trade for the year will amount to close to $215,000,000, an increase of 37 per cent. since 1895. The value of the flour made in the Minneapolis mills in 1899 is $52,000,000, exclusive of millstuffs, and the number of barrels made was 14,500,000. More than one-fourth of the flour made here is exported, and about 65,000,000 bushels of wheat are used in making the Minneapolis output. This is equal to one-third of all the Spring wheat raised in the three Northwest Spring wheat States.

The lumber output for the year was 597,000,000 feet, valued at $10,000,000, including lath and shingles. The individual mills sawed more lumber than ever before, one mill having turned out in one day of eleven hours, 890,000 feet of lumber, or enough to load 175 cars. The Minnesota Beet Sugar Company manufactured 50,000 tons of beet sugar, valued at $2,000,000, and the Minnesota Iron and Steel Company made about 9,000,000 pounds of iron and steel, valued at $500,000. Important enlargements are now in contemplation by the iron company.

PENNSYLVANIA'S IRON TRADE.

Enormous Increase in the Output of the Furnaces—Prices and Wages Also Advanced.

Special to The New York Times.

READING, Penn., Dec. 31.—A review of the past year shows that, from an industrial standpoint, 1899 marks an extraordinary era in the history of East Pennsylvania. It is just about a year since the wonderful development of the iron business set in. Since the beginning of 1899 the advance in the iron business has been rapid. Prices have also largely increased during the year, and thousands who were unemployed have secured work and are now earning good wages.

One year ago refined bar iron of the best quality was delivered in New York at one cent a pound. To-day the same kind of iron is worth two and a quarter cents a pound, an advance of 125 per cent. in one year. Labor, too, is showing this advance, from the mine all the way through to the finished product.

J. H. Sternbergh, ironmaster, President of the Pennsylvania Steel and Iron Company, said to-day:

"When the year 1899 was ushered in we were producing about 230,000 tons of pig iron in the country a week. Now we are turning out 295,000 tons in the same time, or more than 15,000,000 tons a year.

"About 1865 this country was producing 1,500,000 tons of iron a year. In ten years I predict we will be making 25,000,000 tons of iron a year, or more than double what Great Britain or any other country can produce, which will give America the market for the iron trade of the world. All indications point that way, and I am inclined to think the coming year will be one of great activity, especially in the iron trade. This activity extends to railroads, shipbuilding—in fact, every industry consuming iron.

"Much iron is being used in the construction of large buildings and for railway equipment. Iron labor throughout the country is better employed to-day than ever before, and there has never before been such a demand for this class of workmen."

The earnings of the railroads have been in proportion to the increase in other lines.

BROOKLYN FOOTPADS ACTIVE.

Two Daring Hold-ups, Victims Losing Watches and Money.

The activity of footpads in Brooklyn is rivaling that of their professional fellows, the burglars. A bold highway robbery, which occurred on Joralemon Street late on Saturday night, was followed a few hours later by an equally daring hold-up on Hamilton Avenue.

William Connors, an engineer employed on the steamship Ardenrose, lying at the foot of Joralemon Street, was the victim of the first hold-up. He was attacked at Joralemon and Furman Streets by two men and robbed of a gold watch worth $75 and $37 in money. Thomas Marron, thirty-three years old, of 294 Furman Street and Patrick Smith, thirty-seven years old, of 296 Furman Street were arrested charged with the robbery.

Oliver Johnson of 265 Thirty-third Street was attacked by two men at Hamilton and Imlay Streets early yesterday morning, and robbed of his watch and chain. Policeman Reid of the Hamilton Avenue Station, who responded to Johnson's cries for help, pursued the footpads, and after a lively chase caught Edmund Pike, twenty-one years old, of 529 Henry Street. The other man escaped.

New York Central Changes.

The following appointments have been made by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, to take effect to-day: Edward J. Richards to be chief assistant general passenger agent, with office at Grand Central Station; Frank J. Wolfe to be assistant general passenger agent, with office at Grand Central Station; W. M. Skinner to be acting general baggage agent, with office at Albany, vice Frank J. Wolfe, promoted; A. E. Brainard to be general agent, Passenger Department, with office at Albany, vice Frank J. Wolfe, promoted.

Died With the Old Year.

George Gunther, sixty-four years old, was found dead last night in the lodging house at 131 Grand Street, Brooklyn. According to the story he told fellow-lodgers, from time to time he lost all his friends when he lost what money and real estate he owned several years ago. After Christmas he appeared greatly despondent, and hinted that before the new year was ushered in he would die with the old.

TO HOLY YEAR, GREETING

At the Stroke of Midnight Cathedral Mass Begins.

THE PONTIFICAL CELEBRATION

Archbishop Presides at the Solemn Function—Father Lavelle's References to 19th Century Progress.

A congregation which filled the great building to overflowing was present in St. Patrick's Cathedral at the solemn pontifical mass held at midnight by Papal decree to commemorate the beginning of the holy year. Admission to the cathedral was by ticket only, but in spite of this many hundreds of persons gathered outside each door, in the hope of being allowed to enter. After the service began as many as room was left for were admitted.

Precisely as the hour of midnight sounded the first notes of the Processional sounded from the organ, and the choristers, acolytes, clergy, and Archbishop entered the church from the sacristy. The celebrant of the mass was Archbishop Corrigan; the assistant priest, the Rev. Mgr. J. Lavelle, the rector of the Cathedral; the deacons of honor, the Rev. W. J. B. Daly, and the Rev. Joseph H. McMahon; the masters of ceremonies, the Rev. J. N. Connolly and the Rev. T. F. Myhan.

The musical arrangements were under the direction of William F. Pecher, the organist of the cathedral. The same soloists as at the Christmas services were in the gallery, with a full chorus, while the choir in the chancel was under the direction of Mr. Ungerer. The only difference in point of elaborateness between the mass and the mass on Christmas Day was the absence of the orchestra.

Mr. Pecher's selection of music for the midnight mass was a happy one. He chose the Kyrie and Gloria from the Mass in A, by Wiegand, and the Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei from the Mass in F, by Kalliwoda. For the offertory NoNvello's famous Adeste Fideles was sung, while the Graduale was Coombs's "Puer Natus." Perhaps the most effective number was the exquisite Kyrie, which was beautifully rendered by the soloists and chorus.

The sermon was preached by Father Lavelle, who took for his text: "O Lord, Thou hast blessed Thy land. Thou hast taken away the captivity of Jacob. Mercy and truth have met. Justice and peace have kissed. Truth hath arisen from the earth, and justice hath looked down from heaven."

The sermon was a brief one, the preacher giving a retrospect of the century which the Holy Year brings to a close, and declaring that the people of the world had much to be thankful for in the many blessings that had come to them in the last hundred years.

The Pope, added Father Lavelle, had directed that the year just beginning should be a year of thanksgiving for these blessings. There was perhaps some danger of exaggerating the amount of progress that had been accomplished in the nineteenth century; danger of over-exalting what we had done ourselves. But it was not too much to say that the nineteenth century was the most remarkable century in the history of the world. The material progress that had been made was astounding, but the spiritual progress was equally remarkable.

The preacher concluded by declaring that while giving thanks for the past the Church should have hope and courage for the future.

The decorations in the Cathedral for Christmas had been added to for the mass to mark the beginning of the holy year. Great palms flanked the high altar, lilies of the valley being placed near to them. The choir loft was almost hidden in a mass of green, in the centre of which was a star of flame colored immortelles. The Bethlehem which was such a striking feature of the Christmas decorations was still in place.

The Holy Year will be ended by a similar mass at midnight on Dec. 31, 1900. The mass of last night was the first celebration of the beginning of a Holy Year ever held in St. Patrick's, observance of the custom having been omitted in 1850 and 1875.

The first Jubilee, or Holy Year was instituted by Boniface VIII. in 1300 by opening the holy door of St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, and by issuing a bull in honor of the new century. Plenary indulgences were granted to all pilgrim visitors to Rome during the Jubilee Year on condition of their penitently confessing their sins and visiting the Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul fifteen times. Residents of Rome were granted the same privileges on visiting the same churches thirty times.

Boniface's plan was that of a centennial celebration, but the period was shortened successively to fifty, forty-three, and twenty-five years.

The ceremony of opening the holy door by the Pope has not been performed since 1825, Italy being in the throes of a revolution in 1850, and the Italian Government having taken possession of Rome, in 1875, the ceremony was omitted.

ZION AFRICAN METHODIST CHURCH.

Colored and White People Attend the "Watch-Night" Services.

The "Watch-Night" services at Zion African Methodist Episcopal Church on Bleecker Street were attended by the colored residents of the neighborhood and a large number of white people.

Numerous members of the congregation gave short testimony, and their white sisters joined with Pastor Martin R. Franklin in the "Amens" and "God Be Praised" which rang through the church as those who had asked to be prayed for sank to their knees.

The speaker of the evening was the Rev. Dr. Mason of Rochester, N. Y., who is connected with Livingston College, North Carolina. He also made a prayer as the old year was dying and the new one was being born.

As the New Year broke the entire congregation sang "Rock of Ages," and at the close of the singing of the hymn the negroes and whites in the pews shook hands with one another, and appropriate greetings were passed.

During the services Pastor Franklin appealed for funds to help the church, which is now 104 years old, and a collection was taken up several times before midnight. The contribution was a generous one.

Services in Many Churches.

"Watch night" services were held last night in many of the Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches in the city. The services, as a rule, began at 9:30 o'clock and lasted until the new year came in. Midnight mass was celebrated in many of the Roman Catholic Churches.

Arion Society Has a Reception.

The Arion Society welcomed the New Year at its clubhouse, Park Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street, informally last night. Some hundred members and invited guests attended a reception. There was no set programme. Everybody had a thoroughly good time.

WANTED DEATH, BUT NOT PAIN.

Horner Took an Ear Wash and Then Sought Relief at a Hospital.

Edward Horner had no home, no friends, no work, and no money, and under the circumstances did not consider life worth living. Accordingly he made an attempt yesterday afternoon to kill himself. Some time ago Horner had trouble with his ears and went to an eye and ear infirmary, where he obtained some tablets, which he was to dissolve to make a wash. Yesterday he conceived the idea of making a poison mixture of these tablets and using it to end his life.

When he tried the scheme he did not die, but was seized with such a horrible pain in his stomach that he forgot wanting to end his life and went to Gouverneur Hospital and asked for relief. He arrived there at 4 o'clock and the doctors immediately set to work with a stomach pump and relieved Horner of the ear wash and the pain. Policeman Sellick of the Madison Street Station was called to the hospital and, after the man had recovered, took him to the station house.

French Steamer Believed to be Lost.

MARSEILLES, Dec. 31.—Great anxiety is felt here regarding the fate of the French steamer Pierre Le Grand, due at Marseilles from Odessa a week ago. She is supposed to have foundered during the recent gales with her crew of forty-five.

Great Britain's Revenues Increase.

LONDON, Dec. 31.—The public revenue for the nine months ending with December reaches £82,777,044 as against £78,340,468 for the corresponding period of last year.

MR. PADEREWSKI'S CONCERT.

The Great Pianist Plays with Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Paderewski, the famous pianist, gave his only concert with orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. To those who wish to sit under the spell of his sole personality perhaps the orchestral concert is not as attractive as the recital, but for those who desire to hear the player in the larger works of the pianist's repertory last night was a delightful occasion. There was also food for the recital lover, as will be seen by the programme. It was as follows: Beethoven's concerto in E flat, the A-flat ballade, C-sharp minor waltz, prelude, opus 28, No. 15, etude, opus 10, No. 7, and the A-flat polonaise of Chopin, and the pianist's own "Fantasie Polonaise." Before the last number Mr. Walter Damrosch conducted the orchestra in the prelude to "Lohengrin," and before the Polish piece in two Slavic dances by Dvorak.

Among those to whom the higher qualities of musical feeling and understanding are dearer than mere beauty of tone and smartness of technic Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto is conceded to be the severest test to which a pianist can be put. The technical difficulties of the work are sufficient, but they are merely the embodiment of lofty musical thought calling for the noblest qualities of interpretative performance. To play the E flat concerto of Beethoven satisfactorily is to be at once a great virtuoso and a great interpreter. There are, however, always differences of opinion as to just what constitutes a correct interpretation of the "Emperor" concerto. Some are of a mind that nothing in it should have a gentle, wooing tone, but that all should be poised in a serenity like that of the everlasting snows.

These will find not a great deal to admire in the reading of Mr. Paderewski. But to those for whom Beethoven preaches the gospel of living beauty, the beauty that is truth, and is the tonal embodiment of the soul these will always pay the tribute of love to an interpretation which breathes loveliness in every measure. Certainly the audience which heard it last night was moved to enthusiasm by it, and the pianist was recalled many times. Of the Chopin solo numbers there is no need to say much. Mr. Paderewski has lately played them all at his recitals, and the memory of his performance is fresh in the minds of Belford.

But it seemed as if there was a special note of tenderness in the A flat ballade last night. Probably this was because the pianist had been continent in the matter of seusouness of tone in the Beethoven music, and the more luscious tints of his palette came as a revelation. His reading of the polonaise had a magnificent virile end to it brought forth so much applause that he was compelled to add an extra number to the solo list.

The Polish fantasy is not new to this public, but there were probably many in last night's audience who had never heard it before. It has been better played. The orchestra was not always at one with the soloist, and this robbed some of the best passages of their wonted effect. But the excellence of the composer's workmanship in the construction of the piece must have been apparent to every musical hearer, and his part of the performance was most brilliant. At the close of the concert there was the usual outburst of enthusiasm and the unfailing extra numbers.

AT METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Big Audience Hears Mme. Sembrich, Mlle. Olitzka, and Sig. Campanari.

A concert audience not equaled before at the Metropolitan Opera House in the past three years gathered at the second Sunday concert last evening. The soloists were Mme. Sembrich, Mlle. Rosa Olitzka, Signor Campanari, and M. Salignac, with Emil Paur conductor.

Mlle. Olitzka sang the aria "Noble Seigneur," (Meyerbeer,) and several German songs. In response to an encore to Buzzi-Peccia's "Inno Sacro" Signor Campanari sang the toreador song from "Carmen."

Mme. Sembrich sang "Ah, Fors E Lui" from Verdi's "La Traviata" twice, and then Mosart's "The Violet." At her second appearance she gave the aria, "O Luce di Questa Anima" from Donizetti's "Linda," and then the Strauss waltz, "Voices of the Spring," followed by the Chopin waltz, "The Maiden's Wish," to her own accompaniment.

M. Salesa Not to Sing To-night.

The management of the Metropolitan Opera House announced yesterday that M. Saleza was still indisposed and will not sing to-night in "Carmen" as advertised. His place will be taken by M. Salignac.

FIRE MARS BRENNAN'S PARTY.

Thomas Brennan, who lives on the first floor of the tenement house at 405 East Eighty-eighth Street, and also owns the building, gave a New Year's party for his three children yesterday afternoon that proved a very costly affair. When all the bills are paid he will have expended over $6,000, while one of his tenants and a neighbor, owning the adjoining house, will have contributed $1,000 each.

Believing it safer to have the party in the afternoon, Brennan gathered several of the neighbor's children and his own little ones in the front room about 4 o'clock. The shutters were closed and the work of illuminating the Christmas tree begun. He had lit all the tapers on one side and was about to light those on the other when he detected the odor of burning cloth. Just then one of the children with a scream of fright told him that the curtain was on fire.

Brennan ran around and pulled the curtain down, burning his hands painfully. He shouted to the children to get out quickly, as he feared some of their light dresses might ignite. They fled panic-stricken, and fell over each other in a mad rush down the one flight of stairs to the street. Their screams attracted a policeman, who turned in an alarm.

Brennan fought the flames until he was driven from the room. By the time the firemen arrived his entire flat was burning, and the flames had eaten a hole through the ceiling, and spread into the flat occupied by William Phelan. The fire got out through the airshaft, and sparks set fire to the building at 403 East Eighty-eighth Street, burning its roof.

"The next time I give me children a New Year's party," said Brennan last night, "I'll take 'em to the Waldorf-Astoria. It would be a darn sight cheaper."

DELAYED BY FROZEN HYDRANTS.

Firemen Fight Flames in Flushing Savings Bank Building.

The Flushing Savings Bank Building, a four-story brick structure, was badly damaged by fire last evening. The loss is estimated at $5,000.

On the upper floors were lodge rooms occupied by the Masonic and Odd Fellows lodges. There was also an artist's studio containing some valuable paintings, which were more or less damaged. The ground floor of the building, which was occupied by the bank, was not damaged, except by water.

The firemen could have prevented most of the damage had they been able to get to work on arrival, but they found the hydrants frozen and had to wait to thaw them out.

BRYAN TO SEE LEADERS HERE.

To Visit New York This Month, Then Going East.

William Jennings Bryan will be in New York on Jan. 15 it is said in Democratic circles. One of Mr. Bryan's friends said last night that he would be here two or three days, and would have talks with several local leaders of the Democratic party.

It is understood that Mr. Bryan will go to New England from this city, and will also attend the meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington before returning to his home.

The Provident Savings Life.

The Provident Savings Life Assurance Society, having closed its books for the year 1899, announces that it has received during the year applications for new assurances amounting to $55,000,000, as a result of which policies aggregating $47,000,000 in amount, have been issued. This amount of assurance written includes an increase of $17,000,000 over the business written in 1898, and the consequent gain in outstanding assurance in force for 1899 is over 15 per cent. During the year the company has paid to its policy holders over $1,500,000, making a total payment to policy holders since the organization of the company in 1875, of more than $17,000,000. The company announces that it closes the year with no death claims due and unpaid, and its expense ratio during the year has been less than in 1898.

FUNERAL OF FATHER MALONE.

Body to Lie in State in the Church To-day, and Services to be Held To-morrow.

Several hundred persons yesterday passed in and out of the parish house at 69 South Third Street, Brooklyn, to view the remains of Father Malone. Telegrams of condolence continue to arrive from different parts of the State. Among those received yesterday was one from Bishop W. C. Doane of Albany, who expressed regret at his inability to attend the funeral. Recent Townsend of Troy also sent his regrets.

The programme of the funeral ceremonies was arranged yesterday, and at the parish house last night it was announced that the exercises, which might be subject to change, would be as follows: The body, robed in priestly vestments, will be conveyed to the church this afternoon, where it will lie in state until to-morrow morning, when the services will be held. Delegations from the various societies belonging to the church will act as guards. At 10 A. M. to-morrow the priests attached to the church will chant the office for the dead, and at 10:30 the requiem mass will be begun. The Rev. Henry Gallagher of St. Michael's Church will be the celebrant of the mass; the Rev. Hugh Ward of St. Malachi's Church, deacon, and the Rev. Eugene Donnelly of Flushing, sub-deacon. An address will be delivered by Vicar General William Byrne of Boston, a cousin of Father Malone. Bishop McDonnell will occupy the throne, and he will be attended by the Rev. Martin Carroll and the Rev. Thomas Taafe. Bishop McDonnell will probably give the last absolution to the dead priest.

One side of the church will be reserved for the relatives and intimate friends of Father Malone. The active pall bearers will be selected from among the trustees of the church and officers of the various societies. The interment will be in Calvary Cemetery.

The relatives of Father Malone have selected as honorary pall-bearers ex-President Benjamin Harrison, ex-Gov. Levi P. Morton, Edward M. Grout, President of the Borough of Brooklyn; ex-Mayors Seth Low, David A. Boody, and Charles A. Schieren; Theodore A. Havemeyer, Regent William H. Watson, ex-Congressman Felix Campbell, Brig. Gen. James McLeer, Superintendent of Schools William H. Maxwell, John D. O'Donohue, Dr. John Byrne, and Moses May. All have signified their intention of being present at the funeral with the exception of ex-President Harrison, who telegraphed that he would be unable to attend, but asked that his name be continued on the list of pall-bearers.

Father Belford, who was sent to take charge of the parish after the death of Father Malone, will not begin his duties until after the funeral of Father Malone.

Sorry to Lose Father Belford.

OYSTER BAY, L. I., Dec. 31.—The news that the Rev. John J. Belford of St. Dominic's Church had been named by Bishop McDonnell to succeed the late Father Malone in Brooklyn did not become known to all of his parishioners until this morning. Father Belford, who is thirty-six years old, was born in Massapequa, South Oyster Bay. Among his staunchest friends here is Gov. Roosevelt. When he announced to his congregation to-day that he had been ordered away many cried.

HENRY MARCUS IN TROUBLE.

Wife Aids in His Arrest on a Charge of Swindling and Then Wants to Make a Complaint Herself.

On complaint of Mrs. Margaret Smith, a boarding house keeper of 108 West Seventy-third Street, Henry Marcus, thirty years old, was arraigned yesterday before Magistrate Deuel in the West Side Police Court. Marcus and his wife formerly boarded with Mrs. Smith, and the latter alleges that on Oct. 28 he gave her a check for $50.75 in payment of a bill of $48. She gave him the difference in cash, and a couple of days later the check was returned to her as worthless. Before she could do anything about the matter, she alleges, Marcus disappeared, leaving his wife and mother-in-law at her house. The two women afterward went to live in a flat at 474 West One Hundred and Forty-sixth Street, and it was through their aid that Mrs. Smith finally succeeded in causing the arrest of Marcus.

Mrs. Smith alleges that Marcus belongs to a well-to-do Baltimore family, his father having died in that city a few months ago, leaving an estate of $3,000,000. She says that she appealed to certain of his relatives to make good the amount of her loss, but that instead of doing so they sent Marcus to a sanitarium at New Haven, Conn., and supplied him liberally with money. Marcus left the sanitarium last week, and, returning to this city, attempted to see his wife. The latter notified Mrs. Smith that he was in town, and his arrest followed. Mrs. Smith declares that he owes many other persons in this city, and that the assertion of his relatives that he is insane is untrue.

When Marcus was arraigned his lawyer, Norman W. Kerngood, made no denial of the charge, but said his client had been placed in a sanitarium because his mind was affected, and that he was not responsible for his acts. Magistrate Deuel held the prisoner in $300 bail.

After the case had been disposed of Mrs. Marcus, who is a handsome young woman and was stylishly dressed, stepped forward in court and said she desired to make a charge of abandonment against her husband. She said that he had not contributed to her support since he left town last October. Magistrate Deuel said that one charge at a time was enough, and declined to entertain the woman's complaint.

PROBING CUSTOM HOUSE FRAUDS

Deputy Collector of Havana Suspended Pending Inquiry.

Special to The New York Times.

HAVANA, Dec. 31.—A sensation was caused in Custom House circles, and it soon spread over the entire city, by the suspension from duty of Señor Arturo Arostegui, Deputy Collector, on account of the recent frauds by the Appraisers, through which, judging from the increase of receipts during the last few days without any apparent increase in the amount of shipping, the Government must have been robbed daily for some time of from $10,000 to $20,000. It is not believed, however, in official circles that Señor Arostegui has been guilty of any irregularities, although sufficient evidence has been laid before Collector Bliss to warrant his suspension, pending investigation.

Every effort continues to be made by the friends of the accused Appraisers to have the charges against them suppressed; and it is believed that the culprits endeavored to have Señor Arostegui arrested, believing that his cousin, Señor Quesada, has influence enough in Washington to secure a discontinuance of the prosecution, and that he would exercise this influence more readily if his relative were supposed to be involved.

The more the Government representatives look into the frauds, the worse they appear to be. Apparently a large majority of the Havana merchants have been mixed up in a wholesale conspiracy.

SEARCH FOR A RUNAWAY BOY.

Henry Landgraf, Ten Years Old, Left House, Vowing Never to Return.

For several hours yesterday afternoon policemen from the Morrisania Station vainly searched the woods of Fleetwood Park and the New York Central yards adjoining for ten-year-old Henry Landgraf of 1,245 Brook Avenue. The boy left his home Saturday morning. He had played truant from school, and as a punishment his mother would not give him permission to go with his companions skating in Fleetwood Park. Henry ran away, vowing that he would never return.

His mother feared he would make good his threat. Once before he sulked in the woods for two days, and when found was almost starved. It is because he may have some such mood now that the police made the search. Several citizens assisted them, but the boy was not found.

Although ten years old Henry is described as delicate, and it is said he looks not older than eight. He wore a dark coat, gray knickerbockers, black laced shoes, black stockings, and a toboggan cap. His mother has five children, and Henry is the oldest. Mrs. Landgraf is ill from worrying over the lad's disappearance.

NEW BRIDGE TOWER FIRE.

The masonry for the new East River bridge tower at the foot of Mangin and Delancy Streets is about eight stories high at present, and the top is anything but a pleasant place on a cold day. Last evening Watchman Grogan, whose duty it is to watch the works about the projected bridge, discovered a fire at the top of the masonry.

An alarm was sent in and the firemen found it necessary to raise a hose to the top of the tower, where the ropes and gearing used in building the structure were discovered to be on fire. The damage was about $10. How the fire started is a mystery.

DEATH LIST OF A DAY.

Charles Augustus Williams.

Charles Augustus Williams of New London, Conn., died yesterday at his Winter home in Washington. He was one of New London's wealthiest and most prominent citizens. While a young man he had charge of the Pacific Ocean interests of the firm of Williams & Haven of New London, who operated one of the largest fleets of whaling ships in America. At that time negotiations were in progress between Russia and the United States to cede Alaska to this country. When the deal was consumated Mr. Williams was the first American to plant the American flag on the Island of St. Paul, Alaska. He afterward went to Washington and secured the sole right to fish in those waters. Together with a number of San Francisco capitalists the great Alaska Seal Fishery Company was formed, and millions of dollars were made in the venture.

Mr. Williams was the first American to discover the immense guano deposits in the Pacific Ocean, and organized another company to work them. Another fortune was made in this venture.

The deceased was born in New London in 1820. He leaves a daughter, Mary, and a son, Major William Williams, who served in the Spanish-American war. Mr. Williams has filled all the offices in the gift of the city. A large park perpetuates his memory. The funeral services will be held in Washington on Wednesday.

A Sound 6% Investment.

Bronx Realty Co.

(Incorporated under the Laws of the State of New York.)

OFFICERS:
President, JOHN DE HART. Treasurer, JOHN REINSCHMIDT.
Counsel, MORTIMER K. FLAGG.

An investment in real estate in the City of New York, in the line of development and progress, is one of the safest and most profitable in the world. Nowhere is the appreciation in values more rapid and the development faster than in the Borough of the Bronx.

The Bronx Realty Company has been incorporated for the purpose of dealing in real estate in Bronx Borough and vicinity. The operations of the company include the purchase of real estate at forced sales and in the open market when the prices are right; the advantageous resale to builders or to home seekers with or without building loan, and the holding of particularly desirable properties as an investment. Every parcel now held by the company has increased in value since its purchase.

The Bronx Realty Company was formed in 1896 with a fully subscribed capital of $50,000. This capital stock has recently been increased to $100,000, and is divided into shares of $100.00 each, par value, bearing interest at the rate of 6% from the date of issue. In order that the company may more quickly extend its operations, a limited amount of stock is offered for public subscription. This stock is a first lien upon all the real estate holdings of the company. For the benefit of the small investor scrip certificates are issued in amounts of $10.00 or more, bearing 6 per cent. interest from date of issue, and exchangeable in amounts of $100.00 for preferred stock certificates.

The plan of the company enables the small investor who wishes to invest his savings in real estate to do so immediately, with the same security, and the same return, pro rata, for his money, as the capitalist who can afford to invest many thousands in real estate holdings. The Bronx Realty presents to the investor the safest and BEST method of real estate operation. EVERY HOLDER OF STOCK OR SCRIP BECOMES A PART OWNER OF THE COMPANY'S REAL ESTATE HOLDINGS

AND SHARES IN THE EARNINGS.

The management of the company is in the custody of capable men of long experience, whose names give assurance of a careful, businesslike policy. Every advantage afforded by knowledge, skill, and correct business methods inures to the benefit of the shareholder.

The centre of population of New York City is moving steadily and naturally northward. In the year 1883 the population of the entire north side was about 67,000. To-day the population of Bronx Borough numbers 300,000. With the advent of Rapid Transit, which is now assured, the increase will be proportionately even greater in the future, with a relatively proportionate advance in real estate values. It is the purpose of the company to take advantage of this by increasing its holdings as fast as possible.

At a time of unusual speculative investing, it is well to consider the substantial character and the large profits of real estate investments.

The stock of Bronx Realty Company represents to the investor an unusual opportunity, with principal secured, and the assurance of a rapid appreciation in the value of the stock.

Subscriptions will be received and inquiries gladly answered at the company's main office, No. 1,637 Fox Street, or at the branch office in the Smith Building, 148th Street, Third and Willis Aves.

MONEY EASIER IN BERLIN.

BERLIN, Dec. 31.—Since the monthly settlement on Thursday, which passed off smoothly, the money market has been decidedly easier. Money is now offered freely at lower rates, London exchange declining. Further exports of gold are improbable. Only $3,000,000 for export were taken directly from the Reichsbank last week, and some gold was imported.

The financial papers point out that the ease with which Berlin has passed the close of the year demonstrates the solidity of the German money market. The explanation offered is that Germany took the most correct view of the war in South Africa and its effects, making preparations for months against the yearly settlement. Hence speculative engagements were reduced to a minimum. Nevertheless, it is understood that the demands upon the Reichsbank last week were enormous.

The Chamber of Commerce reports and the press reviews for 1899 pronounce this the best year Germany ever had. There has been enormous activity in all lines, and the outlook is now most excellent. The Hamburg Chamber of Commerce expects the boom to be one of long continuance, and believes that sudden reactions are improbable. On the other hand, the net profits of the year were seriously affected by high wages and the cost of raw material.

A coal famine prevails in Western Germany, and business concerns at Dusseldorf have petitioned for permission to deliver empty coal cars at the mines on Sundays.

The iron market remains firm. Berlin dealers have raised the price of bars and sheets 5 marks.

AS TO TRUST COMPANIES.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The recent decline in the prices of stocks of the so-called new trust companies to a figure below their true value is in no sense an indication of a weak financial condition, but, on the contrary, simply illustrates the extremes to which impulsive purchasers have carried their ideas. The desire to ally themselves in enterprises conducted by men of affairs well known in the financial community created a fictitious value in new trust company stocks, a result greatly deplored, as the inevitable reaction was sure to result.

The business of a trust company is not built up in a day, neither is it made permanently profitable except by untiring energy, backed by capital, brains, and conservative management. In the case of one new trust company a very large amount of the stock was taken by the Directors and financial institutions for permanent investment, irrespective of any immediate profit, the substantial results being looked for after the development of business.

The extreme decline from high prices has now resulted in a situation entirely healthy, and it is safe to say that the reports to be shortly made public by the new trust company, not identified with discredited enterprises and underwritings, will show surprisingly well.

The lessons of the past are not likely to be lost in the conduct of the business of the trust companies which can show a clean bill of health, especially when they are managed by well-known financiers.

BRIGHT OUTLOOK FOR INCREASED BUSINESS

Great Confidence in the Prospect for this Year Shown by Reports from the Principal Cities of the Country.

In almost every line of trade the outlook for increased business for the present year, over that done in 1899, is regarded by those best qualified to judge, as remarkably bright. In several lines the prospect is said to be better than it has been for a great many years, not only for more business, but for better prices. The demand has apparently exceeded the supply, and the latter cannot well be increased for a twelve month or more. The result is necessarily higher prices.

DRY GOODS.

John C. Eames, General Manager of the H. B. Claflin Company, says of the outlook: "Owing to splendid crops and generally good conditions, commencing in 1897, the general demand for merchandise has been increasing until the present time. This demand has been so steady and gradual that it has hardly been noticed throughout the country until quite recently. For this reason the general stocks of merchants have been more or less depleted, and the production has not been materially increased.

"In consequence, the demand having increased and the production being about the same, prices have naturally, and in a healthful way, risen beyond all expectations. As the demand is still increasing, and as it is now too late to increase the production for at least another twelve months, it is natural to suppose that the market for dry goods will continue strong for at least that length of time. In case the demand in this country should for any cause fall off, and the production catch up to the demands, we have the assurance that all the foreign countries are looking to us for merchandise. They are already persistently knocking at our door, and as soon as conditions change and we find ourselves with a surplus, we will find a ready market for all that we can produce for years to come.

"New York looks especially to the South and Southwest for a great part of her trade, and that section of the country to-day is in better shape in every way to do business than ever before.

"Collections have been very good, generally speaking; there have been very few bad debts, and merchants everywhere seem to have money enough to do business with."

Said Georg. L. Putnam of Sawyer, Putnam, Brook & Co.: "In the dry goods line the outlook is excellent. We have not sold goods so easily for a great many years. Our collections have been remarkably fine for the last year and a half. It seems that the merchants in the interior have all the money they can use, and I don't remember a time when losses from bad debts were so trifling as they have been this year. Goods, of course, are advancing, and I think the wholesale people are getting advances as far as they can.

"The most encouraging thing we have discovered is the liberality of the merchants all over the country in placing orders for new supplies.

"It looks to me as if the demand for goods in 1900 would be still better than the demand experienced in 1899. There seems to be plenty of money for legitimate business, and I don't see why there should not be in that, unless too much of it gets tied up in industrial enterprises. There has been an enormous capitalization of industrial concerns, and I apprehend that the trouble the country will experience a few years hence will be caused by the collapse of some of these overcapitalized concerns rather than by an overproduction of manufactured articles as in the past."

MILLINERY.

Hill Brothers, wholesale milliners at 806 and 808 Broadway, say: "The outlook for the millinery business in 1900 is healthful and promising. For several seasons previous to the present year the retail dealers have been very conservative, buying carefully, almost timidly. As a consequence of this policy there are very few embarrassing accumulations of stock, and dealers are in excellent condition on this point. The general impetus to trade which has prevailed during 1899 has infused courage and ambition where timidity has been manifest, and we already see indications of a disposition to buy more largely in the ensuing Spring season, and thus be prepared to meet the increased demand which appears in sight. With the mass of people employed, and, as a rule, at good wages, more money will be spent during 1900 than for many previous years. Retail dealers in this line appear to realize this, and evince a determination to be ready for an increased business.

"In factory towns, where women are employed in manufacturing interests, this will be especially true. When such are receiving the present good wages a great outlet for millinery exists. It is also true that the prosperity which affects this class favorably likewise creates a plentiful financial condition with those whose relation to these large interests is that of 'dividend receivers,' which contributes to an increase of business for fine goods. We believe, therefore, that Jan. 1 will usher in a year which for the millinery business will prove a veritable 'record breaker.'"

"We have great expectations for 1900," said James G. Johnson of the millinery house of James G. Johnson & Co., whose business career extends over a period of nearly fifty years. "The general financial and trade conditions of the country as they appear to-day, I believe, justify us in anticipating a very prosperous year in our business. Speaking in a spirit of hopefulness, I would say it ought to be the banner year of the generation. The wonderful prosperity of the present is unquestioned, and I see no reason for any change being imminent. Speculations as to the probable effect of the South African war, or the National elections, I will leave to Wall Street and the politicians."

CLOTHING BUSINESS.

"In nearly fifty years of business experience," said William C. Browning of Browning, King & Co., "I don't believe I ever saw a time when prospects were so bright. Labor is everywhere employed, and prosperity is so general that in spite of the higher prices of wool and other materials there has been an increased demand for our finished goods. Our orders are much larger than at this time last year, and still larger than those of the few years preceding. Prosperity is on so firm a foundation, and the danger of a political unsettlement so little to be feared, that I do not anticipate any check upon business from the approaching Presidential campaign.

"On the other hand, I don't think I ever saw a time when we were so dependent upon Europe for a continuance of our prosperity. If British reverses in the Transvaal continue, and English investors in American securities find it necessary to withdraw large amounts of money from this country, the temporary stringency would, no doubt, affect our domestic trade very disastrously for a time, however beneficial the final results of such a movement might be."

Said I. N. Heidelberg of Bierman, Heidelberg & Co.: "Business prospects in general seem brighter than I have ever known them to be in forty years of experience. The clothing trade was never so prosperous, and is on a safer basis than I have ever seen it. We have received already more orders for the Spring trade than we filled during the first six months of 1899. There is no surplusage of stock in the hands of either retailers or wholesalers, and although the price of woolen goods has advanced, owing to the scarcity of raw wool, I do not think there will be a falling off in demand. The election will cut no figure in the course of business this year—unless present signs are reversed."

Marcus M. Marks of David Marks & Sons was in accord with the general opinion.

"For the last ten years," he said, "there has not been such a flattering prospect in the wholesale clothing business as at present. The general prosperity is fully reflected in the apparel trade. The price of woolens has been advancing rapidly, and the laboring people in our line have been able to secure steady employment at higher pay. In fact, all the signs are satisfactory, and everybody in the trade is working at full force to supply the increased demand. Better grades are being called for, which is quite natural after the bad times we have passed through, when people were compelled to wear poor grades of garments, that did not give thorough satisfaction. Our firm is making greater preparations for 1900 than at any time during the twenty-three years in which we have been in the clothing business, and our orders, coming in daily, encourage us in this direction."

M. Naumburg of M. & W. Naumburg, said: "The prospects for our branch of the wholesale clothing business, namely, the medium to fine grades, for the coming year are very good. For a while cheaper grades were largely called for. Now the tide has turned in favor of good, honest, well-made, stylish goods, and we therefore confidently expect a large business and good returns for 1900. Orders for the Spring are larger in volume, and we think it is safe to predict that there will be not only no surplus, but a scarcity of Spring clothing before the close of the season. In the Fall of 1900 goods will be higher, but the trade is prepared for it, and, if our manufacturers are not unreasonable, there will be no trouble in getting a modest advance. Cloths and clothing have been too cheap, and from the woolen manufacturer to the retail clothing dealer the returns were not satisfactory during a period when goods kept on declining. The present and future look bright for the wholesale clothing industry."

THE DRUG TRADE.

William S. Mersereau of the wholesale drug firm of Schieffelin & Co. said: "Our line is prosperous and in good shape. The prospects for the coming year are that business will be much increased, as there has been a gratifying advance in the value of goods over a year ago. In the export trade business has also been good. Many of the lines of goods that are exported are higher than they were a year ago. Briefly, I may say that the improvement of the past year developed from a local into practically a National condition of healthy activity, and the steady movement into channels of consumption of a very heavily increased volume of merchandise could not but stimulate confidence in all departments of the market. Conservatism has marked the action of purchasers, and this has prevented the accumulation of surplus stocks. Another result of this conservative policy has been the checking of any tendency along the line of speculation, an element which none of us believe is a desirable addition to legitimate business. It is safe to say that prosperity along these lines will continue. The demand at present is very good."

John McKesson of McKesson & Robbins said: "The volume of business has been excellent, and we expect it will continue to be during the coming year. The increase in prices which bids fair to keep up has put the drug trade generally in a prosperous condition, and there is no reason to complain. The outlook for 1900 at present is, therefore, very gratifying. The drug trade shares the general prosperity of the country. However, it does not vary much from year to year, except that in times of prosperity the fancy goods departments show increases in goods moved and corresponding profits. I am not prepared to say now how the export business will be. It has been good. Barring extraordinary conditions, such as wars, there seems to be nothing in the outlook to prevent a continuance of good trade."

ELECTRICAL INTERESTS.

Walter C. Kerr of the firm of Westinghouse, Church & Kerr, which is allied to the Westinghouse interests, said, in speaking of the outlook in the electrical field, that he wished to be understood as referring to the machinery and its accessories installed with electrical plants, as the electrical part by itself represents but a small per cent. in relation to the whole cost in the field of engineering. "I think," said Mr. Kerr, "that the engineering outlook for the coming year is going to be very good, especially for large enterprises. It is fair to say, however, that the maximum conditions have passed. It is well they have, for the production of the country otherwise could not have kept up. Barring financial difficulties, such as war scares, and more or less incidentally the undue inflation of certain of our industrial enterprises, business in our line is going to continue at an enormous rate for a considerable period.

"Raw materials are expected to decline in general, as they have been fictitiously high. That will have a good rather than a bad effect, but I will say this—that if we have financial flurries they are going to interfere with the general prosperity, for the reason that many enterprises already projected will be the more difficult to finance. However, so far as we know now, a large amount of work is being developed which will crystallize during the ensuing year or two.

"Export business is increasing at a very great rate. Where is it going? Just lay your hands on the globe, and that will be the answer. Shipments of heavy machinery are going from this country all over the world. We have sent two big contracts to the Straits of Magellan, southernmost point in Patagonia, and the Argentine Republic. When electric lights are installed in such remote places it has its significance in the fact that the electrical business is certainly expanding. The biggest engines that were ever sent out of this country are now in England, installed directly in the face of English competition. And in addition to this, American firms are making their presence felt in European countries, China, and Africa. We have the facilities here to do the work, giving the best workmanship in the quickest space of time, and at prices that will sell. Foreigners have found this out and are finding it out more and more every day."

Again, referring to raw materials, Mr. Kerr said that there had been declines in some lines, notably steel plates, which are now down $10 a ton. "But," he added, "there is going to be no taking of large individual work based on the possible reduction of raw materials. Manufacturers cannot gamble on that. Practically speaking, the large individual works of this country are filled up with from one to two years' orders on hand, and that has a bearing on how much the trade has to expect to keep the rate of work on a high basis. Foreign manufacturers are being also well filled with orders, which will tend to keep up export trade.

"The class of individual enterprises least busy are the smaller concerns, least able to handle large contracts, and they are the people who do not deserve to succeed. The busy ones are the men of foresight who sighted the coming prosperity and prepared their plants for it. These have all the work they can well handle. The differentiation in this respect is very marked."

An official of the General Electric Company stated that in common with all other industries that of the manufacture of electrical material has greatly prospered during the past eighteen months. The uses of electricity are constantly broadening, and new fields are being opened up, resulting in a steady and permanent increase in the demand for the output of all the leading producers of electrical appliances. In many foreign countries, in which the use of electricity has heretofore been almost unknown, an active demand is springing up, offering the promise of an extensive application of the art to most of the uses to which it is put in this country. Altogether it may be said that, based upon existing conditions and judging by present appearances, the prospect for the future of the electrical industries is more than ordinarily promising.

RAILROADS AND GOOD TIMES.

Railroad earnings during 1899 were of a phenomenal kind and in only one week of the year was there not an increase shown over the corresponding period in 1898. That was in the second week of February, when the great blizzard occurred which blocked travel for several days and cut down revenues accordingly. In every other week the gain was substantial, but it was during the Summer months that the railroads were particularly prosperous. This was true of every section of the country, and found a reflection in many cases in increased dividends, and resumption of payments in others, after years of enforced economy.

The following, based on the weekly and monthly tabulations of The Financial Chronicle, shows just how great the improvement in railroad earnings during 1899 was over the preceding year:

STOCKHOLDERS' PROSPERITY.

The stockholders of many of the prominent railroad and industrial corporations received substantial evidences of the growing prosperity of their companies during 1899 by in many cases resumption of dividends, in others increased payments, and in the newer enterprises the commencement of such disbursements. The announcement of these events at various times during the year attracted attention and had some passing effect upon speculation; but it is unlikely that the ordinary observer of financial affairs has any adequate idea of how the dividend list has grown during the past twelve months. MONEY MARKET PROSPECT.

With not a single exception representative bankers of New York City, discussing financial conditions and the money market prospect for 1900, agree that with the new year a better state of affairs ought to be ushered in, resulting in an easier and more stable money market and sounder and generally better adjustments.

Vice President H. B. Hepburn of the Chase National Bank says: "The outlook is very encouraging. There is good business throughout the country, and that business is followed by good results. Not unnaturally there is an active demand for money to carry on this business, and at good rates. But good rates—and by that I mean 5 and 6 per cent.—are cause for congratulation rather than for alarm for the reason that they signify that the business of the country is active and healthful. There is absolutely no trouble on this side of the water. If we have any difficulty it will be a reflex from the other side, due to extraordinary developments in the Transvaal, such as serious reverses to the British forces. In that event we might be affected by London's apprehension, and money might work higher; but except in such contingency I look for a generally easy money market without any stringency."

President Warner Van Norden of the National Bank of North America says: "Conditions are very good, and I think after the first of the year we will have easier money. Always at this time there is a better feeling, money returning from the interior; and while not so much may return at this time as in former years, it will nevertheless be no inconsiderable sum. The Associated Banks of New York are coming more and more to realize that they have a wonderful power—a power that was well borne out when they joined the other day to stay the panic in Wall Street, just as the banks of London and the Bank of England joined together to save the house of Baring. All this working in harmony illustrates in a forcible way the growth of the doctrine of the brotherhood of man. It is true, action may be taken sometimes from more or less selfish or purely business motives, but nevertheless in many instances the desire to help, to join hands, as it were, is apparent.

"I do not look for any money stringency—certainly there is no sign of it in the near future. England may want gold from us, but we have it to spare. I should imagine we will have good 5 and 6 per cent. rates, but nothing more, and unquestionably no stringency."

President William A. Nash of the Corn Exchange Bank—I think money will be easier, but it is not going to be cheap. In my opinion, it will be in good demand at 6 per cent. all through the year 1900.

President D. D. Parmly, Phenix National Bank—In my opinion, money will be easier after Jan. 10; but I would not be surprised to see a steady 5 or 6 per cent rate because of the great demands for business. But there is nothing to occasion any alarm. Everything is bright and promising.

President E. S. Mason of the Bank of New York—A good deal of money will come out after the first of the year in dividends, &c., and that will help the situation materially."

William C. Duvall, Cashier of the National Bank of Commerce—Inasmuch as the business of the country is so good, I look for fairly good money rates, but no tightness. Everything will be all right as soon as we have turned the corner at the first of the year.

Vice President McGerrah of the Leather Manufacturers' National Bank: "The prospect both in business and in financial circles is very bright; indeed, I do not see how it could be otherwise with such general prosperity. As to rates for money, so much depends on London and Berlin that it is a rather difficult matter to make an accurate forecast. If the British should suffer continued reverses in South Africa undoubtedly that would have a disturbing effect on the financial situation in London, and it would react upon our market. But if there be no such reverses there is at present nothing about which to be apprehensive. The general money market is in a healthy and stable condition."

Other bankers, who did not care to be quoted, expressed substantially the same views.

STOCK EXCHANGE VIEWS.

Views of representative Stock Exchange brokers concerning general stock market conditions, and the outlook for the future, are at once interesting and suggestive. Some of these are herewith given:

Jefferson Seligman: "I think 1900 will be the banner year. The atmosphere has been cleared, and everything warrants the belief of a good market and continued good business. The railroads and corporations of the country are earning a large amount of money, and are daily getting on a sounder basis. Of course, if people get in a panic for nothing, that may affect the situation, but I think they have had their lesson."

Henry Clews: "I think the worst is over and that we will get into a higher range of prices. In my opinion money will be easier from now on."

A. J. Lisman: "So much depends on the money market that it is rather difficult to forecast the future. One thing is certain, and that is that there will be fewer stocks to be made footballs of than formerly. The astonishing rise in prices after the recent decided declines is due to the large short interest undertaking to cover and finding a smaller supply of available stocks on hand than had been anticipated. The fact is that when the low prices prevailed many stocks were bought and taken off the Street."

A. A. Housman: "The year 1899 was a peculiar one for the reason that many of its ups and downs were quite unexpected. As for 1900, in my opinion, it will be a year not only of great business activity, but also of consolidation of large interests, railroad and industrial. The market looks very healthy at present, and I think it will be a good market, though, of course, ups and downs are to be expected. The passage of the Currency bill and the generally better financial outlook will give greater stability to permanent investments."

Sutro Brothers & Co.: "The outlook is bright. The country was never in better condition than it is to-day. In fact, conditions couldn't be better were it not for the fact that monetary affairs are unsettled because of the war in South Africa. If the English would win a battle or two, so that it could be seen definitely how things were shaping themselves, our opinion is that we would see a very good market. The Street is not at all worried politically—that is to say, as to the result of the coming National contest. Good stocks will find a higher level and poor stocks a lower level."

Flower & Co.: "Prices have gotten down to a legitimate basis, and the outlook is very promising. There has been a very great deal of speculation, and it is just as well, perhaps, that the recent break took place. The business of the country is in such excellent shape, and the railroads are earning so much money that it would not be natural to have a poor market now."

Hollister & Babcock: "Conditions are better now than they would have been if we had not had the recent shake up. We ought now to be more cheerful and hopeful. Business is good, and will continue so. Of course, all the trouble here has been in the mix-up in money conditions—that is to say, the fear, whether in the handling of industrials or in the war in South Africa, that there would not be sufficient money for the particular purpose."

Halle & Stieglitz: "Stocks, so far as their intrinsic value is concerned, were never so cheap, and we look for a good rising market between January and February which will last till the end of April at least. About the 1st of May the discounting of the Presidential election will begin. The passing of the Revenue and the Ship Subsidy bills will help things."

W. E. Connor: "I look for easier money and a better market from now on. The situation has been materially improved by the recent shaking up."

Thomas M. Bolmer of Prince & Whitely: "The outlook for the early period of 1900 is very favorable and I am inclined to be bullish for January and February at least. I do not like to look further ahead till I know about the crops. The only unsettling thing is the South African situation, unexpected developments in which may upset values for a while."

Samuel H. Buck of C. L. Rathbone & Co.: "The situation looks more favorable now, and we anticipate a good market. We were bearish some time ago, but since the enormous liquidation which has forced prices down to a better level we are inclined to be bullish."

S. V. White: "I am not a great enthusiast in anticipating an advance in stocks. With money at 6 per cent., there won't be much profit in carrying stocks, which return only 4 or 5 per cent. on their cost. There will be many sharp advances, no doubt, and money will be made by buying stocks when they are depressed, but the profits will be rather of the nimble sixpence order than of the slow shilling. Of course, the business of the country is good, and I will be greatly disappointed if the bank reserves do not run up by the middle of January by reason of the return of money from the interior."

Charles Head & Co.: "Things will unquestionably work to a higher level. There has, however, been severe liquidation, and many speculators who have been hard hit will not appear in the market for some time to come. The situation is much sounder, in that stocks are now in stronger hands. The result of the recent panic will be that larger margins will in many cases be demanded, smaller lines of stocks will be carried, and not so much money will be borrowed. One result of the late decline was that a great deal of money from Boston, Philadelphia, and other outside sources came to the city, which would not otherwise have come here. Business conditions, as every one knows, are sound and prosperous."

Alfred De Cordova: "One of the brightest and most roseate condition of the country came chaos and panic in Wall Street. Enormous liquidation, irrespective of values, has taken place. Present or prospective conditions of industrial enterprises or railway earnings have been ignored. Not alone within the walls of the Stock Exchange, but in most all the security marts of this country and Europe, has depression been most marked. A more senseless scare could not be imagined, but as there is nothing more timid than capital, this is the best reason one can give for the enormous shrinkage in values that has taken place.

"There is hardly an industrial enterprise which has not sold its output ahead and at fair and remunerative prices. There is hardly a railroad in the country that is not making more money than ever in its history, and yet prices have been shrinking from day to day, until a week ago they touched their lowest level, amid wild excitement and enormous trading. Conditions, in the long run, are bound to win. Foolhardy slaughter and reckless selling for long and short account must give place to cool and deliberate buying, based on value and earning capacity. The losses have been fabulous; the liquidation enormous; but where the properties have a defined merit they are bound to assert their value, and as things quiet down I am certain we will see a better security market.

"Out of evil may come good, and the difficulty arising with the Globe Bank of Boston will bring about concentration of interest in the copper trade that will be productive of great good in the future.

"Our ability to ship gold to England, without any detriment to ourselves, when she needs it so badly, is another evidence of our financial strength. The reverses of the English in the Transvaal, which have acted, and are acting as a damper on the speculative community, and which have to play an important part in stock speculation, make it impossible for one to foretell the action of the stock market, if he is to base his judgment on the victories or defeats of the English in South Africa.

"The year 1899 has been one marked with wide and great fluctuations, at times most trying on both sides to the financial strength of both the commission houses and their customers.

"The year 1899 has been one marked with tendant on political situations, bids fair to make a wide and diversified market on all the financial marts of the country, but I doubt if even these bugbears will stop the onward march of prosperity that this country seems to have entered upon."

COPPER STOCK SPECULATION.

A year ago it was stated in these columns that the Copper properties dealt in on the Boston Stock Exchange had appreciated in value during the year $100,000,000. Since then, in one short twelvemonth, they have depreciated $180,000,000. In round figures they are now appraised at $230,000,000.

The year opened, as 1898 closed, with a craze for coppers on. It was, like the crusades of the Middle Ages, a popular movement; people in the Lake Superior region, like the people of Boston, bid against one another for shares—mortgaged their houses, borrowed money, went to all extent to secure the precious stuff. Up went prices—prices both of producing mines and new flotations—and the market was in a whirl. New companies appeared above the surface—selling at 10 and 12 when the public first heard of them. The new companies of the present year are as follows:

Baltic	100,000	$3.75	$1.00
Arcadian	100,000	12.00	4.00
Adventure Consol.	100,000	5.00	2.50
Meadow	60,000	1.25	...
Mohawk	100,000	7.50	3.00
Mass. Consol.	100,000	8.00	2.50
Rhode Island	100,000	5.00	2.00
Winona	100,000	8.00	3.50
Union Land	100,000	5.00	...
Old Colony	100,000	10.00	3.00
Michigan	100,000	10.00	3.50
Trimountain	100,000	12.00	4.00
Parrot	230,000	22½	9,315,000
Quincy	100,000	190	6,000,000
Rhode Island	100,000	17	1,200,000
Santa Fé	250,000	23	4,625,000
Tamarack	60,000	285	5,100,000
Trimountain	100,000	14½	800,000
Tecumseh	80,000	10	400,000
United States	250,000	43	4,750,000
Utah Con.	300,000	52½	9,000,000
Winona	100,000	22	1,875,000
Wolverine	60,000	50	930,000
Total			$187,930,500

Of the companies named above less than half are producers of copper.

It is an interesting factor in this connection that the price of copper itself has been advancing all the time that the stocks of the companies have been depreciating; in other words, the metal market has had nothing to do with the stock market.

So far as the Standard Oil party's operations are concerned, the attack on Montana knocked the price down to about 270, and there it staid for a time, Mr. Bigelow taking all that was offered. Since then there has been a rally to 400, and a subsequent drop to 240. During the bank troubles a fortnight ago Mr. Bigelow is supposed to have sold 15,000 shares to the Standard Oil people at 225 and 230, and they are at present the second largest stockholders. The control of Butte and Boston is understood to have passed to them. It is also understood that they have large holdings in the Bay properties. What their next move will be no one can tell. Calumet and Hecla alone seems beyond their reach.

Great confidence is still felt in Copper stocks, notwithstanding this extraordinary fluctuations. It is pointed out that some of this year's properties such as Mohawk, Baltic, Winona, Michigan, Massachusetts, Adventure, and Victoria, are worth several times what they are selling for, while, of the producers, Osceola, Wolverine, Franklin, and Atlantic are worth double their present market value; and when money becomes easier it is expected, both here and at Lake Superior, that these stocks will again advance.

Boston, Dec. 31, 1899.

BONDS AND MORTGAGES.

Plenty of Money to Loan on Real Estate, but Increased Interest Charges Probable.

Bearing much the same relation to dealings in real property that our credit system does to other lines of commercial activity, the subject of procuring money on bond and mortgage is one commanding the constant attention of the entire real estate fraternity, from the smallest investor to the heaviest professional operator, and from the purchaser of a $5,000 home to the syndicate or corporation that swings a deal involving millions. While the course of property values in various sections of the city may interest one person or another, the mortgage loan market is the one feature of the situation that is watched by all, and changes in it are speedily reflected by the volume of business. An abundance of money and a low interest rate may not, in the face of retarding influences, mean an active real estate market, but the opposite set of conditions—a scarcity of money and a high rate of interest—may be depended upon to put a pretty effectual damper on realty dealing, no matter how favorable the state of the market may be in other particulars.

With these facts in view THE TIMES secured from the representatives of some of the leading institutions in this city their views on the outlook in the loan market for 1900. As a whole, these views must be said to be favorable, that is, from the borrower's point of view. That there is plenty of money looking for investment is the condition everywhere, while the one circumstance that is regarded with some apprehension, is that the favorable business outlook may divert some of this money into other channels, and result in an increased interest rate on mortgage loans.

Savings banks, restricted by the law and by their own conservatism in the matter of appraisals, have not been particularly large lenders recently, but the funds are there, only waiting to be put out under proper conditions.

"To venture a prophecy in regard to mortgage loans for a year in advance or even for six months," said James McManahan, President of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, "is a rather risky undertaking, because conditions may arise within a week that will change the entire outlook. In general it seems to me that so long as the high rates for money continue there will be less money looking for investment on real estate bond and mortgage. This general statement does not, however, apply to savings banks which will gladly continue to loan on real estate security and at the existing rates.

"A very considerable element in the mortgage loan market for the next year," continued President McMahon, "will be the action of the next Legislature at Albany. Among the various tax law reforms talked of is one which will have for its object the taxation of mortgages. There is, I believe, a law of similar import on the statute books to-day, but it is a dead letter, and any attempt to revive it or to enact new measures along the same lines should be discouraged, because it would be almost a death blow to our present system of lending on bond and mortgage. Such a law would be aimed at the large lending institutions, but whom would it finally hit? The mortgagee. If such a bill taxing mortgages should be passed, the lenders would simply advance their rate of interest by the rate of the tax, and the borrower would have to pay it."

Controller Schenck of the Bowery Savings Bank, in speaking of the situation, said that he looked for a slight stiffening of the present rates of 4 and 4½ per cent. as the result of money going into investments other than real estate mortgages.

"This may not show itself immediately," said Mr Schenck, "but, in view of the general reports of increasing activity in all branches of industry, it would seem that, with such increased demand for money, the interest rate is bound to show a corresponding advance. At present we have plenty of money ready to put out on mortgage, and, in fact, we are hindered only by the legal restriction which limits our loans to 50 per cent. of an appraised valuation. It is a fact that a large proportion of borrowers would rather get a loan of 60 to 75 per cent. of the valuation at 5 per cent. than to take a 50 per cent. loan at 4 or 4½ per cent.'

President Merritt Trimble of the Bank for Savings voiced much the same opinion when he said: "The money is here to be put out on real estate bond and mortgage, the only difficulty being that borrowers in a large number of instances are seeking loans on the basis of appraisals that are high beyond all reason."

Controller Jordan of the Equitable Life Assurance Society said

the farmers to accept less than satisfactory prices for their products. The farmer is in a very independent position, more so than at any other time during the last decade. A great deal of farm indebtedness has been discharged, and the money sent East, where the securities were mainly held. Rates of transportation have been in the main so equitably distributed as to cause a greater profit to agriculture and less disturbance to business than for several years.

These favorable conditions in the West have naturally produced a greater activity in general merchandising and manufacturing than for many years. The purchasing power of farming communities has increased, and improvements have been greater than for several years. The general improvement in living conditions is seen in larger purchases of books, furniture, and of nearly all luxuries, in addition to the necessaries of life. The requirements of civilized labor are greater than ever before. The ingenuity and enterprise of our people have enabled us to compete with low-priced labor in foreign countries without curtailing the luxuries and general standard of living of our high-priced labor.

Chicago, in common with the other large commercial centres, will present for the year an exceedingly favorable financial and commercial record. The unique feature of prevailing commercial activity in this country is that prosperous conditions are not confined to any particular section or to any particular branch of industry, but are shared by all classes of persons engaged in legitimate industrial occupations. There have been striking additions to our export trade during the past year. We are reaching out for the world's markets to a larger extent and with greater activity than for many years. The immense productive capacity of this country in the line of manufactures is causing us to seek other markets than our own with greater zeal, if we would avoid overproduction and undue accumulations which past experience teaches cripple activities, congest markets, and bring about a condition of almost disastrous depression.

We are beginning to study more intelligently the adaptability of our manufactures to other countries, and our foreign trade during the past year will show a gratifying change in this regard. We are being taught that this country cannot be an isolated one, and that its interests cannot be confined within the boundaries of North America. We cannot be, we must not be a hermit Nation. We are getting more in touch with the commerce of the world and with universal civilization. Commerce follows the flag.

THE GRAIN TRADE.

There were no artificial influences last year governing the grain trade, and prices maintained a comparatively steady normal basis throughout. Some think there should be very high prices for grain because the country is prosperous. Grain or foodstuffs generally are not affected in this way like iron and steel, for instance. In good times people do not eat any more than in dull times. The probabilities are that they eat even less of cereals and more of higher-priced foods. Good times of themselves, therefore, do not increase the demand for grain. The law of supply and demand remains the governing and determining principle. Wars or famines will have their effect. But in normal years prices will continue normal, and there is no ground for impatience because they do not mount higher as in other commodities.

Chicago remains the great grain market of the world. The general speculative business has not been as satisfactory as in former years. It has been handicapped by "bucket shops" and by the burdens imposed upon members of Boards of Trade by the United States revenue law. The taxes which members of commercial organizations have been obliged to pay have been enormous. It seems a gross injustice to impose taxes upon transactions made at Boards of Trade when transactions of the same kind made outside Boards of Trade are not taxed at all. It seems especially unjust in view of the fact that the vast agricultural interests of the country are to an incalculable extent indebted to Boards of Trade for the facilities for the favorable marketing of agricultural products—that a class of men who have devised economical and prompt methods for moving the great crops of the country in successful competition with other surplus grain-producing countries should be singled out by the Government and taxed to an enormous extent, while those who have not in any special sense built up the markets of the country are altogether exempt from taxation.

It is not that the Boards of Trade object to taxation for raising war revenue, but they do strenuously object to being taxed for transactions when the same kind of transactions made outside of Boards of Trade, and in many instances by illegitimate and unlawful business concerns, are not taxed at all. This gross injustice should be corrected. This board has prepared a resolution upon this subject for presentation at the next annual meeting of the National Board of Trade which will be held in the City of Washington on Jan. 23 next.

POOLING BY RAILROADS.

This board is unconditionally opposed to pooling by railroads. It believes the proposition is a direct, violent, and unwarranted departure from the policy of the people. At the time of the enactment of the inter-State commerce law monopolistic railroad management was detrimental, undermining and demoralizing to the business interests of the country. It has operated to deprive the people of the forces of competition; it has been subversive of the doctrine on which railroad franchises were granted, that doctrine being that railroads were made for the people and not the people for the railroads. In the interest of railroads themselves and to my view, largely exclusive of all business and commercial interests, the proposition of pooling as proposed would create a vast trust under the control, management, and protection of the Government itself.

A pooling contract is in essence a simple contract between competing lines for a distribution of traffic, and declares that each of the lines represented by the parties to the contract shall be entitled to an agreed proportion of competitive business which passes over the lines included in the contract. If in the unhindered and natural course of business any line obtain more than its acceded proportion, then business shall be diverted from such line to the line which is in arrears as to its proportion, and if that cannot be done or brought about, the carrier receiving the excess of tonnage shall make compensation by money payment. Such a pooling contract is in unblushing defiance of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Trans-Missouri Freight Association and of the Joint Traffic Association. It flies in the face of the rights of the people, of the beneficent forces of competition, and is diametrically opposed to the policy under which the commercial greatness of the country has been achieved.

During the year this Board of Trade has gone on record as favoring a new department of commerce and industries equal to the other Government departments. We have also passed resolutions regarding sound finance and other questions of the day, and have specially called the Government's attention to forestry. We believe that intelligent forestry will have beneficial effect on the soil, on commerce, and on the National health. We have taken steps to promote the corn propaganda at the Paris Exposition. Our exports of corn are increasing every year, as also are our exports of flour. On the whole the outlook is most satisfactory.

GEORGE F. STONE.
Secretary Board of Trade, Chicago.

BANKING IN THE WEST.

The general financial condition in the Mississippi Valley, and in all the country tributary to Chicago, is most healthy. During an experience of between thirty and forty years I do not recall any time when general conditions were more prosperous. This is true of all interests, commercial, agricultural, industrial, and transportation as well.

From a financial point of view, the most notable feature of the situation is the continued strength of the country banks. We have a very large country clientage, well distributed, and it is a remarkable fact that the country banks have almost entirely disappeared as borrowers. They are constantly increasing as a factor in the purchase of commercial paper. We are constantly in communication with banking correspondents throughout the entire West, and from even as far in the Southwest as Arizona and New Mexico, we have orders from local banks for the purchase of commercial paper. This has continued all through the prevailing New York monetary stringency, and naturally has resulted in a relief of the money market in the larger interior cities.

This abundance of money at interior points has resulted largely from the unprecedented liquidation of local indebtedness, and a corresponding increase of local deposits. It indicates a highly prosperous condition among the people, presaging an increased consumption of commodities for an indefinite period, unless some new and unforeseen factor of disturbance should appear.

The two things which might have disturbed these prosperous conditions are the undue inflation of stocks, and consequent lapse in values, and the fear that we might enter another Presidential campaign under such conditions as might involve interference with the present monetary standard, resulting in large withdrawals of deposits, as in 1896. The regent high rates for money in New York, and consequent liquidation of stocks, seem to have saved us from undue speculation, which was one of the dangers. The attitude of the President, the Senate, and the House as to forthcoming legislation on the currency question, renders reasonably certain our deliverance from the other anticipated danger and to have established confidence in the maintenance of the gold standard.

The banks of Chicago and the West, while well loaned up, seem amply able to accommodate all legitimate borrowers at full but fair rates. Hence, viewed from a banker's standpoint, the outlook is most satisfactory.

E. S. LACEY,
President Bankers' National Bank.
Chicago, Ill.

John J. Mitchell, President of the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, the second largest banking institution in the United States, said:

"Speaking for Chicago alone, our banking business being local exclusively, I am justified in saying that this city is in a very comfortable and healthy financial condition, although there is no urgent demand for money. Like several other of the larger Chicago banks, we have large loans placed in New York, where they could be called in at once should the necessity arise. There is no indication of such a necessity, and the situation is easy. The demand for 6 per cent. money continues normally, and from all reports Chicago is peculiarly fortunate in not being subject to the drain of deposits that has been experienced by many Eastern banks. From what I learn concerning the situation of the purely commercial banks, I am also safe in saying that the same easy conditions prevail throughout the West. In St. Paul and Minneapolis, money is even cheaper than in Chicago, some large loans at 5½ per cent. being reported. These centres have not their usual supply of grain to increase the demand for money.

"Merchants and manufacturers are all profitably employed in this section, as in other parts of the country. The only feature of the financial situation in which Chicago still lags behind, apparently, is the real estate market. Real estate transactions, outside the Chicago business centre, are practically stagnant. This doubtless results from overproduction and overspeculation in the World's Fair period and from the rapid extension of elevated road transportation. The latter has made suburban points twice as available for house seekers as compared with former conditions, and the vacant intervening property consequently suffers. These conditions will rectify themselves in due season, but meanwhile the Chicago real estate market is the one drawback to the general financial situation. That this condition is purely local is shown by reports from both East and West, where there is a steady improvement in the real estate market.

"Grain and provisions were never in a healthier condition than at present. So far as Chicago is concerned, and this is the centre for these commodities, the grain and provision trade is in a healthier condition than at any time during the past three years, so far as dealers are concerned. The latter are now making their carrying charges. They can store in December, and carry to the following May, and make their interest and charges. As for the provision men, for the first time in two years they are now making a profit on raw material. In the recent war between the packers, there was no money made on raw material, and the only profit was in the manufacture of by-products. These conditions have been changed for more normal ones, and the outlook in the provision trade was never better.

"So far as the temporary shortage of money in the leading financial centres has any bearing on the general financial situation, it looks to me as if the United States could send a supply of gold to England with good grace and with profit. We have the gold to spare, and it would be a politic thing to do. The public would know that it was done to effect a loan on the other side, and not from necessity. It would probably be a wise stroke of financial policy to ease the situation in London with the judicious use of American gold."

BOSTON, MASS.

In describing the business of the past year it is difficult to avoid the use of superlatives. In almost every line of commercial and industrial activity there has been a development far beyond the anticipations with which the year opened.

The feeling has existed in Boston for two or three years that business ought naturally to show a more marked recovery from the extreme prostration following the crash of 1893 than has been the case. The recovery has been long in coming, and for that reason commercial interests, while looking for an improvement during 1899, did not anticipate such a general advance along all lines as has taken place. As a matter of fact, it has been a year of fruition. Orders have been plentiful beyond the capacity to meet them, and prices have been once more securely placed upon a paying basis.

In most of the lines of industrial activity in which this city and vicinity take a prominent place, the severe experiences of the recent "hard times" have operated to bring the operating expenses down to rock bottom, and the influx of orders has brought to those establishments not only a large, but a paying business. It is true that the prices of raw products that enter into manufacture have advanced, as, for instance, the price of hides, but the price of the manufactured product has also kept pace with them, there being a general advance all along the line.

Labor is now fully employed. The Winter upon which we recently entered will probably show less idleness and less suffering than have been experienced for many years. Wages have been restored from the low level to which they were forced during the panic years, and in some cases have risen to a higher plane than they occupied during the "boom" years prior to the panic.

The local merchandise business of this city has been enormous, and if the records of the transportation and transfer agencies are to be taken as a guide, exceeds in volume the business of any previous year.

As will be readily seen from the foregoing, the outlook for 1900 is distinctly brilliant. There is no prospect that there will be a diminution in the demand, either at home or abroad, for the products of our factories and our workshops, or that the production, large as it is, will be in excess of the demand. The purchasing power of all classes is greater to-day than it has been for nearly a decade.

The phenomenal increase in our exports of products or manufacture during the last four years is an unmistakable indication that we have entered into permanent occupancy of the foreign markets, and that the question of the extension of our foreign trade, especially in goods that represent to a large extent the element of labor, which is of especial interest to this great manufacturing section of the country, is one which we are rapidly solving.

While it is not perhaps to be expected that this distinctly upward movement will continue unabated indefinitely, it seems altogether improbable that the coming year will witness any diminution in either the volume or the value of the trade that is now being done. WALLACE F. ROBINSON,
President Chamber of Commerce.
Boston, Mass., Dec. 28, 1899.

WOOLEN GOODS.

BOSTON, Dec. 31.—The year has been one of great prosperity in the woolen goods trade. The advance in prices has not equaled that in cottons, but the situation to-day is favorable for an upward movement of great magnitude. The new goods which will be opened Jan. 1 will be 15 to 20 per cent. above last year's in price, and if the goods sell freely, an additional advance will probably be recorded, as the value of wool is fully 30 per cent. higher than last year.

The mills are all busy, and the American Woolen Company, which controls the production of worsteds, has advanced the wages of its operatives 10 per cent., to take effect Jan. 1, 1900.

The record of the year in the wool trade will hardly be excelled by the year now coming. The sales reach the enormous total of 345,000,000 pounds, of which 292,500,000 pounds were domestic wool. This total is the largest in certainly ten years, except that in 1897, the year in which the Dingley bill restored the tariff, when 377,270,000 pounds were sold. Prices are up, scoured wool, which brought 40 to 43 cents on Jan. 1, 1899, now being quoted at 65 to 68 cents.

For the first time in the history of the trade wool has been exported, and in large quantities, too. The stocks of wool on hand are now in the neighborhood of 70,000,000 pounds, mostly domestic. This is about 70,000,000 pounds less than a year ago. The bulk of the supply in the United States is in Boston, the Western market never having been so closely cleaned up.

COTTON GOODS MARKET.

BOSTON, Dec. 31.—The great advance in prices of cotton goods has been the result of a steady upward movement through the year. Production has been heavy, both North and South, and is still heavy. The mills have contracts enough on hand to cover their production for the early months of 1900. There is a smaller stock of unsold goods on hand than probably ever before in the history of the trade at the opening of a new year. Home consumption has been enormous, while the increase in the export business has been very marked. Cotton yarn spinners are sold far ahead, and a famine in some counts is apparent. There are no spot stocks.

A feature has been the general advance in wages of operatives, in consequence of which no labor troubles are looked for in the immediate future. The number of operatives at the New England centres is probably 123,000. Besides these, many small centres and single mills will swell the number to 150,000, calling for an increase in the total pay roll of more than $10,000,000.

	1897.	1898.	1899.
Middling cotton	5½c	5 13-16c	7¼c
Standard sheetings	4¼c	4½c	6c
4-yard sheetings	3½c	3½c	5½c
Print cloths, 64-64	2¼c	2⅜c	3½c

The number of packages shipped during 1899 has been a little more than 500,000, valued at $19,000,000. Last year's total was 366,000 packages, valued at $13,000,000, and in 1897 the shipments were 322,782 packages, valued at $12,421,000.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

BOSTON, Dec. 31.—"The boot and shoe trade is closing the most prosperous year since 1892," says W. L. Terhune, publisher of The Book and Shoe Recorder. A detailed review of the year's business is, they say in the trade, impossible owing to the diversified nature of the business and the territory embraced.

Mr. Terhune also says that the much-discussed tariff on hides has had no deterrent influence upon the business, for the reason that scarcely any hides are imported for boots and shoes.

The export trade has increased phenomenally. In 1889 there were sent abroad 518,750 pairs of the value of $585,902; the exports during 1899 amounted to 1,835,287 pairs, valued at $2,711,385. Of the exports this year 852,242 went to England, $504,095 to the West Indies and Bermuda, and $409,067 to British Australia.

LOWELL, MASS.

The revival in manufacturing at Lowell is phenomenal and embraces all the varied lines of industry. Mills and shops are now running up to the limit of their capacity, textile machine shops, in fact, beyond what has heretofore been assumed to be their maximum of production. The few properties vacated during the "lean years" are being rapidly taken, and several acres of additional floor space for knitting, worsteds, wood manufactures, weaving, and boots and shoes are being supplied. Never in the history of the city have the pay rolls and the disbursements for mill and shop supplies been so large. The wages in textile mills have been advanced during the year 20 per cent.

The larger mercantile houses of the department store class report largely increased sales.

While there have been some large transactions in real estate the offerings of house lots at auction brought no bidders until just before the cold weather set in. The indications are that we shall have a good and steadily improving real estate market in the Spring. In fact, real estate ought to go very high, but for the amount of territory opened up by the extension of electric railroads to all the neighboring towns and villages.

Some of our mill corporations have established plants in the South for the manufacture of standard cottons and print cloths, two investing very largely there, but finer goods are substituted here for the coarser lines, and the result of Southern competition promises to be a benefit rather than an injury to the "Mother Textile City of America."

Finer goods require more complex machinery and higher skill. To meet this demand we have established a great textile school, fully equipped with the best modern machinery and most complete chemical and dyeing laboratories for thorough instruction in all textile processes. The students now number 340.

While the demand for our textiles and textile machinery is in part to supply depleted stocks, it is not, like that of the Spring of 1895, entirely so, for there is abundant evidence of a strong consumers' demand and our most experienced mill and machinery managers give assurance of several years of excellent business.

JAMES T. SMITH,
Secretary Board of Trade.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The business of New Orleans for the past year, particularly the Fall business, has been good; the promise for 1900 is brilliant.

The year closes here with more commercial problems solved and more difficulties and obstacles overcome and removed than in any previous twelve months. During the last Summer (as in that of 1897 and of 1898) business was somewhat disturbed and handicapped by quarantines; but this was only for a short time, and did not affect the volume of trade, which was larger than for the previous year. It served, however, to stimulate the measures for better commercial facilities so that the city would be able to handle more business and to handle it more expeditiously and cheaply; and for improved sanitary conditions, as the latter play an important part in the commercial and industrial prosperity of New Orleans.

Among the improved port facilities provided for is the rearrangement of the trunk railroads entering the city, so as to afford the roads greater facilities in handling their traffic. The Illinois Central has been granted the right to lay its track along the city front for a distance of some four miles, so as to place it in immediate connection with the river wharves and the steamboats and shipping landed there, as well as with the factories, the majority of which are on the river front. The other trunk lines have applied for additional facilities, which will likely be granted them, and provision will probably also be made for the construction of a belt line around the city.

The roads, on their part, have agreed to increase their wharfage and dock facilities, and to construct new depots, warehouses, &c. The wharves will come under the control of the city again next year, and a Port Commission has already been created to manage them, which should, and likely will, reduce the wharfage dues more than one-half of that now being exacted. A further step toward the improvement of the commercial facilities of New Orleans will be taken on the recommendation of the United States Commission in favor of improving Southwest Pass so as to give a thirty-five-foot channel to the gulf, work on which will be begun this year.

The sanitary improvements made during the year have been the partial completion of the drainage system and the voting of a tax which will give New Orleans $14,000,000 to $16,000,000 to be devoted to establishing a modern sewerage system and a new or improved water works plant.

All these improvements have had such a stimulating effect as to offset any injury done by the Summer quarantines and to close the year with the largest total of business done since 1896 and a healthier business tone than ever.

Briefly there has been an increase in the railroad tonnage received here of 11 per cent. over 1898; of a 5 per cent. increase in the ship tonnage; 8 per cent. increase in the total trade handled, and a material improvement in bank clearances. Considerable new trade territory has been secured, and New Orleans now has steamers running to eighty-three different European and American ports.

Among the features of the year were the development of trade with Japan via the Suez Canal and the consequent appearance of a number of Japanese cotton buyers in the New Orleans market, and a large direct business with South Africa via Cape Town and Durban, the British Government having found that it can purchase at New Orleans at great advantage supplies for its armies there, as well as material for the construction of its African railroads, with the result that it has established a special commission here to purchase all needed supplies.

These improvements have occurred mainly during the last three months of the year, the early Spring and Summer having been unfavorable. The old year goes out under more favorable conditions than its predecessor and ushers in a far more promising new season of 1900.

Among the favorable conditions existing may be mentioned:

1. A revival of the grain trade, which reached a promising status in 1897, but degenerated somewhat thereafter. It will be as large this season as ever.

2. An extension of New Orleans trade into Arkansas and other districts which have until recently been monopolized by Memphis or St. Louis.

3. The consolidation here of the Central American business formerly shared by other Gulf ports, (Mobile and Galveston.)

4. The development of a large timber business and a decided improvement in the export of iron and other similar products through this port.

5. A marked increase in manufacturing. The consolidation of the tobacco and cigar interests of the country, instead of injuring New Orleans, has, by making the city the Southern centre for these interests, increased the number of operatives 50 per cent., and will increase the output proportionately. The cotton mill movement which has lately shown itself in the South has reached here, and the necessary capital is now being subscribed for the building of additional mills here.

These improvements have naturally had a beneficial effect on the value of all local stocks and securities. The consolidation of several of the street railroad lines, as well as improvements made by them, has resulted in an improvement in value estimated as high as 26 per cent., while bank stock has advanced fully 8 per cent., and other local securities an average of 9½ per cent.

The condition of the outgoing year about represents the promise for the new year. Much of the work arranged for in 1899 will be begun in 1900. The public improvements proposed and financed for in the city will bring about an expenditure of some $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, which will naturally have a material stimulus on business generally. The railroads alone will expend several million dollars for improved facilities, and the United States $8,000,000 to deepen Southwest Pass. All these improvements will prove additional stimulus to an already improving commercial and manufacturing condition. The new year just opened ought to be one of the best New Orleans has ever known, because it has for the first time (in many years) taken the offensive commercially in seeking to recover some of the trade territory lost by it in the last twenty years, and with every promise of success.

President Chamber of Commerce.

COTTON CROP OUTLOOK.

Business throughout this section of the South has been excellent and collections more satisfactory than in many years.

Our great agricultural product is cotton, and, while the crop is probably at least 20 per cent. short of last season's yield, the crop of that year was very low in grade, sold at prices which were ruinous to the farmer, and the cotton seed, which is a most valuable adjunct, was generally badly damaged and sold at the lowest figures on record.

The aggregate value last year of the crop of low grade cotton raised and seed marketed throughout the South was probably $300,000,000. This year, with a very much smaller crop and a corresponding decrease to the planter in the expenses of gathering, baling, and marketing his product, with a crop of high grade cotton bringing 40 per cent. more, and cotton seed selling for double the price of last season, the cotton crop of the South is netting the planter about $400,000,000, or at least $100,000,000 more than last year.

Our rice crop has been excellent and prices have been both satisfactory and profitable to planters.

The extreme cold weather of last season seriously damaged the sugar crop, and, while the yield has been small, planters have energetically gone to work and fields are in fine condition for the coming season. Well-informed parties predict the largest acreage in sugar for next season that Louisiana has ever had.

Factories throughout the South have greatly increased in number, are proving most profitable and satisfactory investments, and have added greatly to our wealth and prosperity.

Our farmers have learned wisdom by experience, and have their barns filled with corn, hay, and feed products sufficient to enable them to plant and cultivate next season's crop. Diversified crops and raising at home most of the products necessary for economical and successful farming is one encouraging sign of progress in the South, and the outlook is the most encouraging in years.

President New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

SAN FRANCISCO.

General Trade Has Been Good, Oriental and Hawaiian Business Prosperous, and Outlook Is Flattering.

San Francisco, owing to its situation, being the metropolis, not only of the State of California, but of the Pacific Coast—that portion of the United States facing the Orient—has long been considered by thinking men to be the natural emporium of the Oriental trade with the United States, having always had more or less intercourse with the Far East.

Some three years ago a Bureau of Foreign Commerce was formed, representing the Chamber of Commerce, Board of Trade, and Manufacturers and Producers' Association. This bureau sent Mr. William R. Townsend to the Orient for the purpose of investigating the markets there, with the special view of placing our products and in stimulating and opening up our trade with that section of the world. Mr. Townsend on his return made a report, which was published in The Daily Report of our city Jan. 8, 1898. His labors there resulted in a large number of orders for Eastern Siberia, China, and Japan being filled in our market. Every year for the last few years has shown an increase in our trade, not only in China and Japan, but particularly with Eastern Siberia.

Last Spring Mr. William M. Bunker started, as Honorary Commissioner of the Chamber of Commerce, on a trip to Japan, China, and Eastern Siberia, across Russia to Europe, and is now in Paris. His object was particularly to look into the status of our trade with that section of the world, with the view of increasing our markets there, also investigating the effect of the Trans-Siberian railroad upon the trade of the Pacific Coast.

From the time of that memorable 1st of May, when Admiral Dewey opened to us the Port of Manila, giving our merchants the additional means of extending our trade in that portion of the world, interest in Oriental matters has largely increased here. As Hongkong has been the central entrepot for the commerce of China and the surrounding Eastern world, we believe that Manila in time will develop to be the second point in the Eastern seas, if in the future she does not eclipse Hongkong.

The effect of the Spanish war and subsequent events has been to stimulate the ocean trade of San Francisco. The past year has been a prosperous one in our State. Our grain crop has been largely in excess of that of the previous year. While prices have been somewhat lower, the output being larger it has placed a great amount of money in the hands of our farmers, and enabled them to pay off their debts to the country banks and merchants. Our present pack of canned fruits has been on the average possibly 25 per cent. greater than that of 1898. Our production of dried fruit shows an even greater increase. With one or two exceptions our output of canned goods was sold before it was packed. In fact, in some cases orders were refused owing to there being no more fruit to sell. We mention these various items, while properly pertaining to our State, as the prosperity of our city necessarily depends upon that of the State.

Our bank clearances and our savings banks deposits show a good increase over last year, indicating a healthy state of business in the city.

Real estate, while it has not advanced to any extent, is now showing a healthy tone, having been depressed during the last three or four years. With the general increase of our trade, commerce, and business prosperity we think that the effect upon real estate will be much more marked in the future.

Our trade with the Orient is extremely difficult to figure on, owing to the large amount of Government supplies that have gone to the Philippine Islands in Government transports. While we know the quantity is very large, we are unable to obtain any statistics, the Quartermaster's Department refusing to give any details. So while the annual statistics of our shipments taken from the Custom House report to Oriental points may not seem to be very much larger than last year, the amount of trade and business and merchandise forwarded to these points has been largely in excess of previous years.

The Hawaiian trade since the annexation of the Islands has about doubled. Pending the negotiation of the Hawaiian treaty we were told by those opposed to it that the trade of the Islands did not amount to much, and had practically reached its maximum. Subsequent events, however, prove how false these prophecies were. The growth of this trade is, indeed, phenomenal. The development of the sugar plantations there and the large increase of exports from our State and coast caused by that development have had a most beneficial result upon our city.

As far as the present season is concerned we have been blessed with abundant and timely rains, which give us every prospect of a most bountiful crop of all the productions of our State.

Our mining industries are also in an exceedingly prosperous condition. Recent development in gold-producing properties, particularly in the southern portion of our State, has been another source of prosperity to us.

Our wharves are filled with merchandise and our docks with shipping. In fact, it is difficult for vessels to obtain places in order to load or discharge their cargoes. Our streets are crowded with drays and trucks carting to and from places of shipment many products of our State and merchandise in transit. Our business houses have been and are exceedingly busy. Retail trade is unusually good, the stores being crowded with purchasers. It was the most prosperous Christmas season that our city has had for very many years. When labor was scarce and money tight, only the necessities of life were bought. Now our stores dealing in articles of luxury have all they can do to attend to their business.

The coming year, in all departments of trade and industry, is most promising to us. We seem to be on the threshold of having the most bountiful and prosperous year in our history. E. SCOTT,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce, San Francisco, Cal.

SACRAMENTO, CAL.

This city and its extensive tributary country have for two or three years shown a steady strengthening and improvement.

During the last year the fruit, wheat, wool, wine, and mining interests have been especially prominent. The large output of various fruits has profited by the limited supply East.

Our large deciduous fruit interests are vigorously protesting against the proposed tariff deduction in favor of Jamaica fruits being sent in under cheap labor, cheaper packing, and nominal freight.

The yield of wheat, barley, &c., was a full one, the first being largely held for better prices. The wool producers believe that the foreign product which was dumped on our port markets some three years ago has been largely consumed, and they are satisfied with the present, and have faith in the future.

The mining interest has taken a new lease of life. Energetic efforts are found to be the leading feature of all mining localities. The output is most satisfactory and consequently very stimulative for that important industry.

The financial interest which centres here has its bright and its dark sides. The commercial banks are full of money, and much activity prevails in legitimate commercial and business lines. The sale of products has given a healthy growth to personal bank accounts; many mortgages have been paid; new accounts showing accumulations are being opened; interest is being lowered, while speculation is yet quite too weak to walk alone. On the other hand, the leading savings bank vaults are congested with idle money. They have been and are refusing to accept over a hundred dollars from regular depositors, and would prefer not to receive any.

State, municipal, and other desirable bonds are taxable, while in the hands of our own citizens, hence cannot be advantageously carried by our savings banks. Mortgage money is being paid in, either in part or in full; borrowers with good real estate security are very few; savings banks dividends are growing less and inactivity bordering on stagnation seems to hang like a cloud over this interest which is the friend of the wage-earner and money-saver. While some little money is cautiously going into building and loan societies, more is being invested in homes. Unimproved city real estate, farms, orchards, and vineyards are all showing that the former depressing situation is giving way, and an upward movement of values is striving for the ascendency.

Warehouses are full of wheat, and, it is held with small advances and in many cases without any, waiting for a better price to add more volume to the present ample money supply.

The outlook for 1900 is now led by the rainfall, which is always the "bow of promise" for this State, and which already has been 9 inches for our section, being over one-half of the average yearly fall, with five months' supply yet to come.

The general situation is certainly now very promising; labor is in demand, and with a good, strong conservative financial measure to be passed by the present Congress to hold the money interests of the country steady against the threatening situation which usually accompanies a Presidential campaign, and 1900 will ride out that storm in good shape, and its results will, no doubt, show an improvement over those that have invariably characterized many like campaign years of the past.

JOSEPH STEFFENS,
Director of the California State Bank, and former President of the Chamber of Commerce.
Sacramento, Cal., December, 1899.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

The year 1899 has been one of exceptional activity in the commercial and industrial affairs of Cincinnati. Labor has been more fully employed than for several years. While this city has a large general merchandising trade, its more conspicuous feature is the extent of its manufacturing interests, covering a wide range. In nearly or quite all lines of any significance there has been an important increase during the year, and it is estimated that the value of the manufactures produced within and immediately adjacent to the city during the year represent a total of fully $300,000,000, or an average of about $1,000,000 a day for each working day of the year.

The notable instances of activity and of increased production embrace factories which turn out metallic products, such as machinery, machine tools, &c. Prominent in the lines of machinery are such as are called for in woodworking operations, furniture factories, electrical plants, laundries, pumping, tobacco manufacture, baking establishments, sugar mills, elevators, &c.

The manufacturing of clothing is a prominent industry, and this line has prospered. The production of boots and shoes is a large and growing interest. The output of soap factories is greater than elsewhere in this country, and the past year was probably not equaled in any other place in the world. The number of vehicles made here this year exceeds that of any other locality in the country.

The bank clearings of a city are not infallible guides to the relative extent of business operations, but they are a good general index. The year 1899 will mark a new record in this respect, and will show a gain of 16 or 17 per cent. in comparison with the preceding year, and 17 per cent. in excess of the average for ten years prior to 1899—the total representing about $755,000,000.

The outlook for the coming year appears to be very encouraging. The local factories are now in active operation covering calls for distribution of goods in all portions of this country, and largely and increasingly to foreign markets. JOHN H. ALLEN,
President Chamber of Commerce.
Cincinnati, Ohio.

PITTSBURG, PENN.

Pittsburg is enjoying a phenomenal era of prosperity. Never before in its history at the end of the year have our manufacturing interests been so rushed with orders. Every plant is being pushed to its utmost capacity; labor is fully employed, and no one needs to be idle who really desires employment. New manufacturing plants in great numbers have been added to the long list of those already firmly and successfully established, and additions have been made to almost every industry situated in this district.

Our merchants, in a jobbing way, have felt the new conditions, their facilities being taxed to the utmost to meet the demands made upon them.

Retail dealers are enjoying the best trade in a decade. Those who look after the holiday business made unusual preparations, and there has been no disappointment. The wage earners, by being fully employed at higher wages, are spending their money freely, so that this condition can only be answered as being phenomenal.

Summarizing, it simply means that the condition of every branch of business is more than satisfactory, being beyond the anticipations of even the most sanguine, so that manufacturers and merchants of Pittsburg are happy.

The outlook for 1900 is most promising, no serious clouds appear on the horizon, and, unless the unlooked for happens, the coming season should bring with it the greatest era of prosperity that we have yet experienced. Values will range higher, but this will not be burdensome, as the earning capacity of wage earners and others will be on a higher plane, more than equalizing the additional cost of living.

Then, with wise legislation, the continual cultivation of foreign commerce, by which our entire surplus may be exported, no violent disturbances of the financial conditions now existing, so that confidence may remain unshaken, the placing and keeping of our Nation as a source of supply for all foreign lands, not only for products of the farms, but also of our mills and factories, should maintain and retain these prosperous times almost indefinitely.

JOHN BINDLEY,
President Chamber of Commerce, Pittsburg, Penn.

READING, PENN.

Manufacturers and merchants of this city have reason to feel gratified at the business of the year just closed and encouraged at the prospects for the ensuing twelve months. Industrial establishments have in many instances largely increased their capacity to meet the demands that have been made upon them.

The Reading Railroad Company's increasing business has necessitated the construction of additional repair shops, and the Reading Iron Company has expended the greater part of $1,000,000 in the erection of new tube mills, rolling mill, and furnaces, and has now under way a new forge. A steel mill is among the possibilities and may become a reality within a year. Wages in nearly all lines of employment have been advanced.

Naturally, our merchants have benefited by this renewal of industrial activity, and they report a better business than for a number of years past. Their confidence in the future is apparent in enlarged stores and additional lines of merchandise to their stocks.

The manufacturing interests of this city are of so diversified a character and so firmly established that they were not so quickly affected by the panic of 1893. When that was past they were quick to recuperate, and while there is some expectation of a falling off in business during the Presidential year, the feeling generally prevails that there will be no marked decline either in volume or in prices. E. R. GERBER,
Secretary Board of Trade.
Reading, Penn.

DULUTH, MINN.

While this town was a severe sufferer from the financial panic, which prevailed from 1894 in this city to 1898, the gain in nearly every description of industry has been particularly marked in the past year. Thus there were shipped from Duluth up to Dec. 16 17,613,652 bushels of grain, being a gain over 1898 of 465,233 bushels. The flour output over the great lakes was 100,000 barrels heavier than it was last year.

In 1898 the iron ore shipments from Duluth aggregated 1,883,372 tons. In 1899 the total was 2,919,052 tons, being a gain of over 1,000,000 tons.

There were 315,495,280 feet of lumber sent out from Duluth by water in 1899, an increase over the shipments of 1898 of 57,603,720 feet, according to a report compiled by The Duluth News-Tribune.

The total freight tonnage from Duluth of lake shipments for 1899 to Dec. 16 was 4,188,789 tons. In 1898 it was 3,047,130 tons, a difference of 1,141,659 tons in favor of the year just closed.

The present status of business in Duluth and total "head of the lakes" is shown in the subjoined table, just issued by the Duluth Improvement Association, relating to the total business at this point, that which is not designated as "head of the lakes" pertaining to Duluth:

With the first fall of snow and the coming of steady cold weather business has improved, particularly in the logging camps, where cold weather and good sleighing is necessary to lumber work.

The architects of the city are busy on plans of buildings to be erected here in the coming year. Real estate is firm in price, it being held to-day on Superior Street, the main retail street, with inferior two-story buildings on the same, lots 140 feet deep, at $1,000 per front foot.

It is anticipated that nearly every kind of business in Duluth will be better than heretofore in the coming year.

THOMAS E. HILL,
Secretary of Duluth Improvement Association, Duluth, Minn.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The year 1899 has witnessed a decided revival in industrial activity, and a résumé of business operations in this vicinity shows a satisfactory improvement over the preceding year. Both skilled and common labor has found uninterrupted employment at fair rates.

Grand Rapids, conspicuous for its manufacturing industries, has 484 establishments in operation, with an invested capital of $18,000,000, employing 15,000 hands, and turning out a product valued at $35,000,000, principally in furniture in all its branches, carpet sweepers, felt boots, and woodworking machinery.

Our home trade has increased its business, and the demand for Grand Rapids goods has enabled our manufacturers to stiffen prices, and another decided advance has been agreed upon to take effect Jan. 1. The business failures for the year in this vicinity are hardly worth mentioning.

Our jobbers report increased sales in staple articles of groceries, domestic dry goods, boots, shoes, &c., amounting to 20 per cent. With the retail trade the usual supply of heavy clothing and woolen goods has been moving very slowly, due to the unusually warm weather for this season of the year. Otherwise business holds good, with fair profits.

The business outlook for 1900 is better than it has ever been at the opening of any year in the city's history, and the same is true of the State at large.

WILLIAM H. ANDERSON,
President Fourth National Bank.
Grand Rapids, Mich., Dec., 1899.

MOBILE, ALA.

As to the conditions of business in Mobile and the outlook for the coming year, I think I may safely say that we can look back on the past year with satisfaction, and forward to the next with confidence.

Mobile naturally has felt most sensitively the growing development of the Alabama coal and iron industries, for she is the only seaport of this rich mineral State, and is situated at the mouth of the great river system, which provides water transportation from the interior of the State. Ever since the National Government dredged the channel which connects Mobile with the Gulf, thus permitting ocean-going steamers to come up to the city, the shipping trade has been increasing, and the year 1899 shows the largest import and export business in the annals of the city. Mobile's chief imports during the year were fruit, sisal grass, rubber, c be about $40,000,000 for 1899, of which wheat and flax alone will amount to about $18,000,000.

SALT LAKE CITY.

Compared with all other years in Utah's history, 1899 was by far the most prosperous. Accurate statistics are not yet compiled for the year, but the increase of general business compared with the preceding year in Salt Lake City is placed by conservative and well-informed business men at 50 per cent. This estimate may be taken to be generally applicable to the State, since Salt Lake's business conditions are recognized as responsive to conditions in other portions of Utah. The best trade thermometer we have is the daily clearings of the Salt Lake banks. Accurate returns for the Clearing House to Dec. 15 and an estimate for the remainder of the year place the clearings for 1899 at $126,625,541.26; the figures for 1898 were $77,556,584.73. The increase over 1898 is, therefore, $49,068,956.55, over 50 per cent., a sum and a percentage truly remarkable.

While not capable of measurement by the same standard, the business of Ogden, Park City, Provo, Logan, and other principal towns is reported to show an equal increase. Approximate figures given out by the banks show that the increase in the volume of their business reaches 52 per cent., while the increase in deposits run, in the various institutions, from 40 to 100 per cent. compared with a year ago.

Speaking of prosperity among the masses, a leading banker is quoted as saying: "The fact that a millionaire has decided to erect a building costing $100,000 is not nearly so important to me as the fact that 1,000 people of moderate means have each decided to put up a one-thousand-dollar house. In the former case, it is simply a loosening of purse strings; in the latter, an evidence that there are a thousand people who have taken on the spirit of improvement because they have the cash with which to do it." The general prosperity is further evidenced by the fact that the increase in savings deposits during the year 1899 is in excess of $250,000.

Salt Lake City is so much the home city of Utah, and numbers among its population so many whose business is conducted entirely in other parts of the State, that in the increase of its building is found another strong evidence of the increase in the State's prosperity. Accurate figures are not at hand, but more houses have been constructed in Salt Lake City during 1899 than during any previous year in her history. The residences are all of good class, and among them are several costing over $5,000 and one costing $125,000.

The fact is noted that whereas in former years the dividends from many of the great mines in Utah sought investment in the Pacific Coast cities and in the East, now the principal portion of these dividends are being invested at home. As a result magnificent homes are being built in Salt Lake City and other cities of the State, and many prepentious business blocks are in course of construction. The real estate market gives evidence of a remarkable improvement. Large offers have recently been made for business property which a year ago was not marketable at any price, and some important sales have been closed. The money thus employed, while in great part of home ownership, is still not entirely so. One or two of the large insurance companies are negotiating, and several sales of business locations have been made to Eastern capitalists.

The farmers of Utah report a year of great prosperity. Better prices were obtained than in 1898, and the crops of the State, with the exception of fruit, which suffered from late frosts, averaged a high yield. Manufacturing has since steadily forward, with some increase in the number of institutions and an increased consumption of the product at home. The Provo Woolen Mills report an output of the value of $225,000. Seven and one-half per cent. of this product was consumed in Utah, the remainder going to Eastern markets, and $80,000 of the 150,000 pounds of wool produced in the State during 1899 were consumed by this mill. The plant was worked overtime throughout the entire year, and is now behind with its orders. The record of this mill may be taken as indicative of the record of other Utah woolen mills. The price of wool during the past year has increased from 11 to 12½ cents per pound—the price in 1898—to from 18 to 20 cents per pound.

The Lehi Sugar Works had an exceptionally prosperous year; 13,250,000 pounds of sugar were turned out. The Ogden Sugar Works produced 5,000,000 pounds. The product of both plants was entirely consumed in Utah and Montana. It is authoritatively stated that in 1900 the output of these mills will be as follows: At Lehi, 20,000,000 pounds; at Ogden, 10,000,000 pounds. It will be seen that the sugar-beet raisers of the State have had a large measure of success as the result of the operation of these two big plants.

Mining, Utah's greatest industry, has been in seven-league boots for many months. The increase in the output of 1899 over that of 1898 is estimated at about $3,000,000. The principal increase has been in the production of copper and gold. Mercur and Bingham districts showing the largest per cent. It is believed the value of the total output of 1899 will approximate $18,000,000. The development of new properties has been a marked feature of the year. There are no idle men in the mines, and the supply of labor has not been at all times equal to the demand. The total dividends of twenty-six payers up to the close of 1898 amounted to $36,385,150. The aggregate of dividends of the same payers at this date is $38,247,650, showing dividend payments for 1899 $1,852,500, most of which was distributed among Utah people. Eastern capital has sought investment in Utah mines during 1899 than in any previous year in its history, and many large properties are now in process of capitalization in Eastern centres.

Taking the year through, mining stocks have not commanded the local interest that they did in 1898, although the first few months of 1899 evidenced a continuation of the interest first strongly manifested in the Autumn months of last year. The abatement of this interest is not due to any lack of confidence in the mining industry, but is attributable to the people's disapprobation of the methods of brokers in pressing forward stocks behind which values are wanting. There is, however, a steady demand for the stocks of dividend payers, and the wheel horses of the dividend list enjoy a widespread local confidence.

The signs for the coming year are propitious. Real estate specially promises to be active, and there is every promise that 1900 will show a phenomenal increase along every line of business endeavor.

PORTLAND, ME.

The condition of trade, transportation, and leading industries in this city throughout the past year, and the situation at the close, may be briefly summarized as follows, and what is said of this city will generally apply to the State, of which Portland is the chief city.

As the Spring of 1899 advanced, this city began to awake from the lifeless apathy that had so long pervaded all New England, so that a new life began and renewed hopes inspired courage and restored confidence to all kinds of trade and industries and material interests. Increased lines of transportation were opened and new facilities for all kinds of business were everywhere manifest. Locked-up capital has been freely invested in many new business enterprises within the State during the year, the total reaching well up into the millions.

Wages have been advanced and labor more fully employed than for many years. The advance of freights has inspired a very encouraging revival of shipbuilding in this State, as freight rates seem now to be permanently on a more remunerative basis.

The State has also had a larger number of tourists and Summer visitors than ever before, their coming quickening the demand for stores and food supplies, resulting in the distribution of large sums of money throughout the whole State, and holding a large trade for Portland markets well into the Autumn. During the past two months trade has subsided to normal conditions, and the usual quietness at this season now prevails.

The banks have freely supplied money to traders, manufacturers, and corporations at lowest going rates, till spare funds are well exhausted and there is very little offering at the close. A conservative spirit has prevailed for loans to go out of the State.

Therefore we can confidently say that Maine has largely shared with the whole country in a general prosperity never before approached—at least within our borders—nor were the "signs of promise" ever brighter for the future than at the threshold of the new year.

M. N. RICH.
Secretary Merchants' Exchange and Board of Trade, Portland, Me.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

In no section of the country is the increased activity in trade more emphasized than within the borders of the State of Rhode Island. Prominently in this State are found the products of foundry, machine shop, and factory which the whole world looks to for a great portion of its supply.

The jewelry industry, from the largest factory to the smallest shop, is reporting a greater volume of business during the first nine months of the year 1899 than in any other previous twelve months in its history, and for the last three months a greater output than for any previous six months.

The cotton and woolen mills are experiencing a return to prosperity which is marvelous when compared with the congested condition of their trade less than a year ago. So prosperous has the business become that small plants, worn out and almost obsolete, which had been forced to close during the recent depression, some of them never expecting to start again—so close had the competition with modern equipment become—are being started, and in many cases running night and day to fill orders for goods which buyers are eager to place at an advance of from 20 to 40 per cent. above prices prevailing six months ago.

Foundries and machine shops which a year ago were almost idle have orders to their fullest capacity far into the coming year at greatly advanced prices.

The scarcity of labor and the inability of machinery builders to furnish immediate delivery of new machinery would seem a safeguard against an early checking of the present prosperous condition of trade by overproduction, and the increased earnings of the operatives of every class will insure a long period of prosperity for all.

We are beginning to look abroad for a market that will furnish an outlet for our accumulated products, for we have discovered during the recent depression that we are a great producing as well as a great consuming Nation.

The products of Rhode Island machine shops have already secured a large foreign market, and the constant growth and increase in their capacity speaks well for the success of their enterprise.

In no other place of like area will you find such a diversity of world-known industries, consequently no better place could be found to test the pulse of trade, and the present condition indicates that we have before us a great period of prosperity for the United States.

J. H. HAMBLY,
President Board of Trade.
Providence, R. I.

TAMPA, FLA.

The condition of business in Tampa and contiguous territory is better with the close of the year than it has ever before been in the history of the city. Not only is the aggregate volume of business at this date larger than previously, but there is more of it when calculated per capita or measured by the capital employed.

The revival of business was slow in reaching Tampa, owing to local reasons, chiefly needless alarm and uncalled-for quarantines, and it is only within the last two months that the swell of activity has been specially noticeable. Within that period the manufacture and shipment of cigars have been 50 per cent. larger than the best two months since the factories began operations. This is authoritatively attested by the sales of cigar stamps by the internal revenue offices at this point and by the withdrawal of tobacco from the bonded warehouse.

The manufacture of cigars is the most important interest of Tampa, but all other lines of business are in an equally flourishing condition. Two hundred thousand boxes of oranges have been shipped from tributary territory already this season, and 75,000 remain to go. The truck farms are shipping as extensively as ever, and they bid fair to yield more than in previous Winters. The strawberry season is beginning now, two weeks earlier than the average. The promise is of excellent crops and larger shipments than ever before.

The naval stores business is just being established here, and it will be an important element in our business resources. The railroads and marine shipping are busy to their capacity. All the signs point to the most active and prosperous year by perhaps two-fold that the city has ever experienced. The following summary may serve to give an idea of the average volume of business upon which the coming enlargement is based.

Receipts of the internal revenue office for the twelve months ending Nov. 30, 1899, $435,132; receipts of Custom House for the same period, $303,588; receipts of Post Office, same period, $37,568; number of cigars shipped during the twelve months, 109,862,000; quantity of fresh fish shipped, 4,339,893 pounds.

Value of imports from Cuban, Central and South American ports, $1,360,000; exports to same, $560,000. Both these items are now being largely increased, and it is conservative to say that they will double in 1900.

Number of vessels, foreign and coastwise, entered at the Custom House within the past year, 420, with a total tonnage of 349,259 tons.

It is a safe calculation that the aggregate of business for the next year will be 50 per cent. larger than for the current year as shown above from the records.

H. CUNNINGHAM, Secretary Board of Trade, Tampa, Fla.

NEWARK, N. J.

The City of Newark is essentially a city of manufactures, and every fluctuation in prices acts upon our daily life and makes itself apparent in all channels of trade. The prosperity of the present year has been manifest in the increased sales reported by our merchants during the Christmas shopping trade, which have been fully double those of any preceding year.

We have something more than 225 distinct lines of manufactures, represented by 2,500 plants, whose combined capital amounts to a sum approximating $100,000,000, and, considering the great activity during the year and the general improvement in all branches of trade, our conditions are indeed of a prosperous order.

The output of finished leather was valued at $8,000,000 in 1890. For 1899 it is safe to say that it has increased fully 50 per cent., and the outlook for 1900 gives our manufacturers hopes that this estimate will be exceeded. Newark furnishes fully 75 per cent. of the patent and enameled leather used in the United States, and does a large export business also.

The jewelry industry is great in this city, some eighty establishments being located here. Their output is estimated at $7,000,000 to $8,000,000. Business is at its best, and the leading manufacturers predict a steady trade for the coming year, with increasing sales and higher prices.

In the manufacture of shoes there are some twenty large firms engaged, with a capital of some $2,000,000. Their orders indicate a greater volume of business for the coming year.

Saddlery, harness, and hardware are important interests in Newark, as we have over 100 establishments, employing between 2,500 and 3,000 hands. Reports indicate a most satisfactory outlook for the coming season, the past one being in every respect satisfactory.

This city is the home of the celluloid industry, and as much of their product comes under the category of luxuries, the fact that in all their departments work is being pushed day and night, will in itself, furnish the strongest evidence as to the present general improvement in business and future prospects in trade.

Our chemical and varnish trades have been running to their full capacity with orders ahead. Large consumers in these lines have been most prosperous, resulting in larger orders. It is anticipated by many that business will increase 25 per cent. in 1900. Nothing at present can be foreseen to cause any uncertainty as to their future.

This city is the centre of a large trade in fine machinery and machine tools. There are some eighty concerns operating here, with invested capital amounting to over $5,000,000. One of the largest concerns in the business states: "We certainly have had a very busy and prosperous year. Not only have home orders been increased at advancing prices, but foreign friends knowing the advantages of American machines and tools have been crowding us with orders. Our tools and machines have the reputation abroad of being accurate, and quick and easy to manipulate, consequently they have a greater producing capacity with greater profits, and the coming year is expected to produce a greater activity than the past one."

With reference to iron and steel and goods made from the same, the situation might be summed up in brief, by quoting a reply made by one of our largest manufacturers. He said: "The iron trade is so brisk that manufacturers will not take or make long contracts at the present time, a reversal of conditions existing during the past five years, when manufacturers were compelled to seek business. The outlook was never better, and no reason is manifest that could cause any apprehension regarding the year 1900."

Speaking in general for all the industries in our city, I feel sanguine for the immediate future; all things point now to a year of the greatest prosperity.

R. C. JENKINSON,
President of the Board of Trade.

OPINIONS OF GOVERNORS OF STATES

Belief Generally Expressed that the Country Is Entering Upon a New Period of Prosperity.

COLORADO.

The widespread depression that followed the panic of 1893 was felt by the people of Colorado, but with less severity than by those of the Eastern and Middle States. Such of our mines as produced silver alone were compelled to close down, and camps like Aspen, Creede, and Leadville suffered accordingly. The development of the Cripple Creek district had, however, begun in 1892, and the active demand for live stock stimulated that industry to an unusual degree. Investments of outside capital ceased, it is true, but that fact did not perceptibly retard the extension of our varied industries. The acute stage of the panic was over by the commencement of 1894, since which time our growth and progress have been continued. Hence I give expression to an obvious fact when I assure you that the outlook for 1900 is most flattering for the "Centennial State."

Silver having been deprived of its monetary status in the interest of a so-called sound financial policy, we have determined to furnish the world with gold. Two years ago we took the lead from California as a gold producer, and have more than maintained it since then. Our output for 1899 will exceed $30,000,000, and to that we will add $10,000,000 next year. Our total metallic output for 1899, including gold, silver, lead, copper, and zinc, will not be far from $60,000,000. We are producing in coal an annual tonnage of 6,000,000, while $25,000,000 will hardly cover the range and value of our iron and steel industries.

We have nearly 3,500,000 acres of irrigated land under cultivation, and our fruit is marketed in all the cities of the land. An immense beet sugar factory in the Grand River Valley has just been completed, and others are building on the Atlantic slope. Our cattle and sheep raisers are extending their flocks and ranges.

We have a population of not less than 650,000.

Despite the threatened intrusion of the New Jersey trust, the destruction of the silver industry by Congressional action, and the continued misrepresentations of our people by the press, we are a great, growing, and loyal Commonwealth, prosperous because of our bountiful resources and our energetic and indefatigable citizens. Colorado begins the new year with bright hopes and with brighter prospects than ever before.

C. S. THOMAS, Governor.
Executive Chamber, Denver, Col.

IDAHO.

In reply to your letter addressed to Gov. Steunenberg requesting a forecast of the coming year in Idaho, I beg leave to say that in all branches of industry the outlook is exceptionally bright.

The mineral industry of our State is taking on new life and a more hopeful feeling prevails in respect to that character of investment. It is one of the most essential sources of our wealth, and affords employment for a great portion of our people. For years the Coeur d'Alene lead and silver district, embracing the greatest producing mines of the world, owing to the reign of the criminal element in that district, has been greatly retarded, but is now happily relieved of that impediment.

This means greater development and a multiplied output. The number of men employed in and about these mines has been increased since the establishment of law and the assurance of personal and property rights, and the increase will not abate in the near future. New discoveries are being made and the old mines are giving up marvelous stores of wealth. Much the same conditions prevail in the great Buffalo Hump, the Wood River, the Imnaha, the Seven Devils, the Boise Basin, the Silver City, and the Lemhi districts. In each of these districts there is an air of progress and prosperity of the most wholesome character.

In the expectation that the Nation will manifest sufficient wisdom in the near future to open the mints of the country to the coinage of silver, vast amounts of money are being spent for the latest improved mining machinery, so as to be ready to meet the hoped-for increased demand for that metal. Those interested in this branch of industry reason that this increased demand for money material will be a natural sequence of our foreign wars and acquisitions and growth of commerce. It is not deemed reasonable that bank notes or other forms of paper money will be preferred to silver for money purposes. This in no small measure acounts for the activity in the Idaho mining camps.

The low price of wheat in our State has temporarily discouraged our farmers, but the hope prevails that a larger market will be found for the product of the farms in the future, and the anticipated enlargement of manufacturing and mining and maritime enterprises will tend to raise prices. A great deal is expected, or rather hoped for, in Idaho due to the needs of our new possessions in the Far East. The price of grain is now very low and the grain growers are discouraged, but hopeful. There will nevertheless be an increased acreage of wheat for 1900, and the increase of our volume of currency, which is taken for granted, furnishes a basis for better conditions for the husbandman.

Within the last few years many thousand acres of arid land have been redeemed and made fruitful. This process of reclamation is being conducted with great skill and energy. On irrigated farms and orchards a crop failure is unknown. This year Idaho has shipped great quantities of fruit directly to London, New York, and other Eastern points. The commendation these shipments have received at their destination insures greater activity in our fruit culture.

Stock raising and wool growing are among our principal industries. Our laws are liberal to the cattle, horse, and sheep growers, and these callings are surrounded with safeguards to further foster them in our State. The increase of horses, cattle, and sheep in Idaho has been so great in the last year, and so replete with promise for the future, that capital is being put into these industries quite freely and lavishly.

Another resource of this young State is the vast timber lands. As Eastern forests become denuded and the mills of the older States are closed new ones are being opened in Idaho. Our timber laws are framed with a view to the development of the timber interests, and at the same time to afford protection to the State. The greatest rivalry prevails among Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota capitalists to secure control of the timber lands of Idaho. The consequence is that new mills and increased population are everywhere noticeable in the neighborhood of the timber sections. Of no small moment to the prosperity of the State is the opening to general settlement and cultivation of our Indian reservations. The growth of population and the advance of civilization have made it wise to take from the Indian the rich agricultural lands which he has monopolized without cultivation, and after due compensation place it within the reach of the homeseeker and farmer. The great district embraced in the Fort Hall Reservation in South Idaho will in all likelihood by act of Congress, where a bill for that purpose is now pending, be disposed of in this way the coming year. Increased development will follow and municipal traffic will advance.

The present life and the anticipation of even greater vigor in all the industries of the State have attracted the attention of the various Northwestern railroad managements. The last six months in consequence have witnessed vastly more railroad construction in Idaho than any similar period during Territorial existence or Statehood. New mining districts have been encircled, new agricultural fields penetrated, and new timber lands connected with the markets of the world. There are yet many proposed and surveyed roads reaching out in all directions, and which no doubt will be carried to completion in 1900.

In conclusion it is pleasing to be able to say that the population of our State is growing daily. It comes from all the States in the Union, and is noted for its industry and law-abiding habits. We confidently anticipate that the day is not distant when the riches of our mines, the wealth of our ranges, the abundance of our timber, the thrift of our people will give the State the advanced industrial consequence which now its beautiful lakes, its flowing rivers, its towering mountains, its limitless plains, its blue skies, and warm sunshine give it in the vision of the tourist and in the soul of the artist.

BARTLETT SINCLAIR, State Auditor.
Auditor's Office, Boisé, Idaho.

KANSAS.

I herewith submit a few facts showing the industries and business conditions of this State. Our chief industries are, and always will be, agriculture and stock raising. During the past year these have shown a very healthy development, and are now in a very prosperous condition.

For the past ten years the average yearly production and value of corn, wheat, and live stock was as follows: Corn, 148,000,000 bushels, value $36,000,000; wheat, 39,000,000 bushels, value $23,000,000; live stock products, $47,000,000; live stock unsold and on hand, $99,000,000; miscellaneous crops other than corn and wheat, $31,000,000, making a total average yearly value for the ten years of $236,000,000.

During the year just ended our chief products have been as follows: Corn, 225,000,000 bushels, valué $54,000,000; wheat, 44,000,000 bushels, value $22,000,000; live stock products, $59,000,000, and value of live stock on hand, $133,000,000. The total value of our farm and live stock products for 1899, together with live stock now on hand, is $302,000,000, an increase of $38,000,000 over that of last year and $66,000,000 over the average yearly value for the past ten years.

The reports of 1898 are the only available data concerning the mineral products of the State, when the total metallic products were $10,000,000; non-metallic, $6,000,000; smelting products, $17,000,000. Natural gas was utilized last year more than ever before, and new smelters have been erected, those at Iola and Cherryvale being among the largest in the country.

The deposits in our State and National banks in September, 1899, were $53,000,000; same date in 1898, $45,000,000. For the first time, Kansas has not been compelled to call upon the East for money to assist in moving its large crops, having sufficient money in its banks for that purpose without going outside the State for assistance.

One of the strongest indications of returning prosperity, and an absolutely conclusive evidence of the improved credit of the State, is the fact that during the last year there have been refunded in county, township, and city bonds $2,964,700 at a lower rate of interest. Heretofore the prevailing rates of interest on our bonded indebtedness have been 6 and 7 per cent. During the last year large amounts of bonded indebtedness have been refunded at 5 per cent., other amounts as low as 4½, and in several instances as low as 4 per cent.

Our railroads are being taxed to their utmost capacity to meet the demands made upon them for the transportation of our products.

Our colleges and universities show an increased attendance. This is especially noticeable in the public institutions, such as the State University, Agricultural College and State Normal School.

Good wages are being paid and labor conditions are reasonably satisfactory.

Added to all this, and better than all, is the hopeful spirit of our people that Kansas is entering upon a new era of prosperity and development.

W. E. STANLEY, Governor.

LOUISIANA.

Louisiana will enter the year 1900 under very promising auspices. The State finances and those of the municipalities, parishes, levee districts, &c., are in better condition than they have been since 1860. The bonds and other public obligations are considerably above par. The interest thereon is promptly met at maturity and the resources are ample to maintain these obligations in their actual sound condition. The levees are higher and stronger than ever before. The public schools are more numerous, the attendance greater, and the teachers better trained and more efficient than at any previous period. The same may be said of our universities, Normal School, Industrial College, and other higher educational institutions.

At no time since 1860 have the people manifested more interest in the development of the varied and immense resources of the State than now. There is progress in all our agricultural industries. Improved machinery, labor-saving implements, and intensified culture are being adopted. Our sugar-cane industry is being handled by Central and other factories perfectly equipped for the best and greatest amount of work. Extension of irrigating canals our rice industry in Southwest Louisiana is being tremendously increased. Truck farming, dairying, and the raising of improved stock are everywhere receiving attention.

The low price of cotton in 1898 had the compensating effect of turning the attention of the people to the advisability of establishing factories near the fields of production, and the day is in sight when the profits of the factory will be added to those of the raw product.

Our vast forests of varied timber are attracting unprecedented attention. Great saw mills are being established, and factories to work up the hard woods are likewise in contemplation.

The spirit of progress pervades the people. The question of good roads is being agitated. The paving and drainage of the towns and cities is being looked after, and New Orleans is preparing for such improvements on a grand scale. The great waterways system of the State is also receiving attention, as is also the extension of our commerce with Latin America. Desirable immigration is earnestly desired and capital is being invited into the State. To both exceptional inducements are offered. Very respectfully,

MURPHY J. FOSTER, Governor.
Executive Chamber, Baton Rouge, La.

MISSOURI.

To literally comply with your request to furnish you a brief statement of the present condition and immediate future prospects of the citizens of this State is a difficult task, for to me, a native Missourian, the subject is an important and interesting one.

Missouri being the mid-continental gateway from the compass extremes of the United States, having within her boundaries three great commercial centres—St. Louis, Kansas City, and St. Joseph—almost 7,000 miles of steam railway and a universal network of telegraph and telephone lines; possessing an unsurpassed climate, soil of such variety and fertility as conduces to the successful culture of all temperate zone crops and fruit; extensive forests of valuable timber and practically inexhaustible deposits of coal, lead, zinc, iron, onyx, marble, granite, limestone, fire and paint clays—Missouri, endowed with all of these favorable conditions of location, climate, commercial development, and wonderful natural resources, is peculiarly adapted to the successful pursuit of America's four great spheres of industry—agriculture, horticulture, mining, and manufactures—in all of which we have made wonderful progress during the past few years.

The immense and rapidly increasing inflow of capital and immigration into this State at the present time is evidence of the fact that the citizens of many other States recognize the superior advantages afforded by Missouri.

Based upon a comparison of the results of the two preceding years, with similar conditions and present values prevailing, the aggregate value of the total production of Missouri's farms, factories, forests, and mines for the year 1900, conservatively estimated, would be $500,000,000.

The acreage of Government land in this State is being rapidly reduced, both by homestead and cash entry. At the present rate 100,000 acres will be taken during the next year.

The activity in our mineral development is surprising; tens of thousands of acres are being planted in fruit, and manufactures are being extended at a gratifying rate.

We are proud of our progress and have unbounded confidence in its continuance. We believe that with an American system of finance of volume sufficient to supply the legitimate requirements of commerce, supplemented by just and proper restraint of trusts, our progress and prosperity would be greatly stimulated, as we are convinced that the financial policy being pursued by our National Government at the present time is inimical to the material interests of a majority of our people; but our progress and development next year will be phenomenal notwithstanding the prevalence of this adverse policy.

OREGON.

The outlook for business conditions in Oregon the coming year seems to be good. The past year has been fairly satisfactory, and, with the exception of wheat and hops, prices for our staple productions have been remunerative. Oregon produces more wool than any other State in the Union, and the price per pound at present is above 20 cents—higher than it has been before since the panic of 1893. Buyers express a willingness now to engage wool at that figure for next Spring.

The increasing trade which our new possessions in the Philippines will undoubtedly stimulate will be a permanent factor in building up this coast, which, so far as natural conditions go, is equal, if not superior, to any other portion of the country.

A frank statement of the requirements of our State necessitates the remark that nothing would tend so rapidly toward the development of its natural resources as an influx of that class of immigration that would come prepared to inaugurate manufacturing enterprises in various lines. The field for this kind of investment is a large one in Oregon, for, without doubt, considering the great variety of raw material that abounds here, we import a greater quantity of manufactured articles than any other State in the Union, population considered. The attention of Eastern capitalists has already been drawn very prominently during the past year to the possibilities of our State in this regard, and it is believed that our growth and prosperity will from this time forward be steady and permanent. Our principal drawback is from the sparse population incident to all new countries, and our future is regarded by our most conservative people as very satisfactory.

J. J. GEER, Governor.
Executive Chamber, Salem, Oregon.

MONTANA.

I can say without using many words that conditions in Montana are normal. The mining industry is prosperous and will continue so. Stock interests look better than for many years at this season, and our stockmen expect even better times next year than in the past one. Farming and all other industries are doing well. In fact Montana cannot well be affected by changed conditions elsewhere.

WASHINGTON.

I presume that no portion of our common country presents in a business and industrial way so inviting a field at the present time as that immediately adjacent to Puget Sound. Its commercial advantages are very great and its future prospects can only be designated by the word "magnificent." A map of the world upon a north polar projection will show that a straight line extending from Puget Sound to Japan, China, and the Philippine Islands skirts the Alaskan Peninsula, being vastly shorter than any other route between the Occident and the Orient. In the long run commerce, like everything else, follows the line of least resistance. It is well known, too, to navigators that ocean currents favor the northern route. Doubtless it will be a great surprise to many to be told that the shortest line from California to the East Indies runs near the Alaskan coast. The globe, however, reveals the fact.

Good Bishop Berkeley something like 175 years ago, in his well-known line, "Westward the course of empire takes its way," stated, it is true, a great fact, but the good Bishop did not reveal all the truth. The course of empire in past historical times has also been as markedly to the north. I think careful investigation will show I am correct in saying in general terms that no conflict between the North and South, whether political or commercial, has ever been waged in which the North was not successful. The conquest of England by the Normans was only an overflow from a previous Northern invasion. Civilization began in the south. At the present time the northern nations in Europe—Russia, Germany, and England—are the arbiters of fate. In our own country within recent times a political struggle between the North and the South was waged. We know the result. Commercially it has been and will be the same. Alexander Humbold long ago prophesied that the commerce of the Pacific would one day far exceed that of the Atlantic. He was followed in this prediction by William H. Seward and James G. Blaine. Back of these predictions were geographical and historical facts.

The recent discoveries—as yet only in their infancy—of gold in Alaska have accentuated the natural trend of events. American commerce will in the not distant future execute the evolution of "About Face"; and one day—how far in the future I do not know—a greater city than New York will be built upon Puget Sound.

JOHN R. ROGERS, Governor.
Executive Chamber, Olympia, Washington.

WEST VIRGINIA.

The present has been the best business year of West Virginia's history, and the new year foreshadows even greater success for our people. We are engaged now building five new railroads, and we have quite a number about to be begun next year, the purpose of which is to open up the vast coal fields that are at present distant from railroads. Our increase of the output of coal in 1899 will exceed that of 1898 by more than 3,000,000 long tons. Our increase of the production of coke is about in the same proportion. As new coal fields are now being entered, the increased production this year will be very much larger than was that of 1899 over the one preceding it.

Our forests, which contain the very best grades of all kinds of timber, are also being developed. The songs of the saw and the axe are now being heard in the interior portions of our domain. Our growth in lumber development the coming year will be little short of the wonderful.

All of our manufacturing establishments are running on full time, and I have the assurance that next year cannot be other than a successful one.

We are constantly finding new oil pools, and that, too, in sections that were hitherto regarded as barren territory. Our output of oil for the coming year cannot fall short of 20,000,000 barrels, and will probably exceed that quantity.

Our stock raisers have been remarkably successful the past two years, and additional stock having been added to the various farms and ranches, 1900 promises them greater returns. Farmers generally are prosperous, and with a good season this year will be even more successful than was the past. Money seems plentiful, and on the whole the outlook is most gratifying.

Executive Chamber, Charleston, West Va.

WISCONSIN.

The people of Wisconsin are having their fair share of the prosperity. The financial crisis of 1893, which so unsettled values and caused such timidity and lack of confidence in the business world, is a thing of the past. Values are restored, the timidness is broken, and general confidence prevails. Today every factory and workshop, every farmer, every other kind of business, and every worker is fully employed. Nowhere is there any idleness. The reports of frictions between the different industrial forces are few and unimportant.

No industry was more affected by the general depression than manufacturing, and in no other industry has the revival been more complete. The change, however, has been slow and gradual. Not until 1897 was there any marked improvement. Our manufacturing returns for that year show an increase over 1896 of 8 per cent. in the amount of capital employed and 10 per cent. in the total output. In wages there was an increase of 15 per cent. in the total amount paid and 7 per cent. in the average per worker. The average number of persons employed was about 9 per cent. greater in the latter year, while the yearly time of employment was lengthened by fully 3 per cent. This ratio of increase was more than maintained in 1898, and, while absolute data are not as yet available for 1899, indications point to a still better showing. Many new plants are under construction, and old ones are being enlarged. At present over 150,000 workers are steadily employed in our manufacturing industries.

The farmers are also doing well and appear contented. It is true that the prices of wheat are not at present as high as might be desirable. By this, however, they are less affected, as wheat constitutes only a small proportion of their crop. In this State farming is greatly diversified. A steadily increasing number devote their land to cattle raising and dairying. Corn, oats, and other grains are therefore mostly used as feed, and, instead of going to the market direct, become the raw material of butter, cheese, and beef. This method has proved much more profitable and accounts largely for the improved conditions upon the farm.

With our factories turning out all goods of which they are capable, our workers fully employed and at good wages, and the farmers doing well, it is only natural that our merchants and financial institutions should be prosperous. Such is the case. The sales of the merchants and the deposits of the banks are as great, or greater, than ever before.

On the whole, the industrial and business situation in this State is in a splendid condition. As the growth has been natural and I can perceive no great inflation of values, I feel warranted in saying that this course is likely to continue for some time.

EDWARD SCOFIELD, Governor.
Executive Chamber, Madison, Wis.

WYOMING.

The year of 1899 has been a remarkable one in the history of Wyoming. Never since the days of the cattle boom in the early eighties has money been so plentiful or business so good. The high prices for wool, mution, and beef which have prevailed during the past year have been the principal factors in stimulating business and restoring the feeling of confidence which had long been missing.

Labor commanded high wages in this State during the past year and work could be obtained by any able-bodied man desirous of so doing. Business, in all its phases, has been exceedingly prosperous, and many merchants have made substantial profits after struggling along for years. The coal mines of the State have produced nearly 4,000,000 tons of coal during the year just past, and the railroads have had a heavier business than ever before.

The outlook for 1900 is particularly bright; considerable railroad building will be done, mines will be developed, and other important steps taken in the direction of advancement and progress.

AMERICAN TRADE IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Openings Presented in Other Parts of the World for New Markets and Opportunities to Develop New Ones.

Trade conditions and the outlook for the current year have been discussed by a large number of the foreign correspondents of THE NEW YORK TIMES. A number of their communications appear in the Financial Supplement, but several which arrived a little late are given herewith:

The Netherlands.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES
By FRANK D. HILL,
United States Consul at Amsterdam.

The conditions of trade and finance at the end of 1899 is sound and the new year promises well. There have been conspicuous failures in the tobacco trade, notably that of Binger & Herschel, large and heretofore successful brokers in that market, whose liabilities are very considerable, and the firm of Herbook & Co., in the coffee trade, has recently been compelled to ask for a six months' suspension of payments. Money, too, rules at the very high figure of 5½ per cent., thus tending to restrict speculative, and even legitimate commercial and industrial enterprises.

The great Ports of Rotterdam and Amsterdam are, however, prosperous and advancing, both as trade receiving and distributing centres and as ports, particularly Rotterdam, which hastens on her way, at an accelerated pace, to overtake Hamburg as the great North European port. The figures of the three foremost rivals, which in 1889 were, in millions of tons, Hamburg 4.8, Antwerp 4.05, Rotterdam 2.8, were in 1898 Hamburg 7.3, Antwerp 6.4, and Rotterdam 5.7. Amsterdam is not nearly so considerable a port, the tonnage entering being about 1,500,000 net annually.

It is too early to deal much in facts and figures in detail, since statistics are not available and extended comparison with former years not possible. The tobacco sales are over and the results tabulated. Amsterdam is a free tobacco market, supported by a large cigar industry. The importation for the sales of the different varieties of Sumatra tobacco during the year just closed have been: Amsterdam, 201,877 packages; Rotterdam, 31,532 packages; Bremen, 2,243 packages; total, 235,652 packages. At an average price of 92 Dutch cents per one-half kilogram, the total value was 33,000,000 guilders, which converted at the rate of .402 United States gold per guilder equals $13,266,000.

Of Borneo tobacco, the importation for the sales in 1899 have been: Amsterdam, 18,737 packages; Rotterdam, 3,651; Bremen, 116. Total, 22,504 packages. The sales amounted to 21,567 packages, which, at an average price of 82 Dutch cents per one-half kilogram, yielded 2,663,000 guilders, or $1,050,526.

Of coffee, Messrs. Dunning & Zoon of Rotterdam say, in their circular of Dec. 5, that out of total stocks on hand in eight principal coffee markets of Europe on Dec. 1, 1899, amounting to 235,200 tons, there were in the Netherlands 41,100 tons, against 16,800 in England, 30,030 tons at Hamburg, 13,050 tons at Antwerp, and 109,050 tons at Havre. The world's stock on the same date was 428,430 tons. With such tremendous visible supplies, greater on account of the enormous production of Santos coffee, and the moderate increase in consumption, it is not possible to see much future for coffee unless production be restricted. This restriction is difficult because of the immobility of Brazilian labor and the imperfection of Brazil's credit system. So long as coffee production yields even a living wage so long as Brazilians continue to grow their only agricultural product.

The other colonial products dealt in here extensively, such as sugar, tea, (Java,) cocoa, quinine, tin, and spices, cannot be taken up for exhaustive treatment. With respect to the last named, it may be stated that sugar no longer finds a market in the United States, the Dutch provisions with regard to it being held equivalent to an export bounty within the meaning of the Dingley Tariff act and so discriminated against. The exportation of sugar to the United States, which amounted from the Amsterdam district to 3,500,000 guilders in 1896 and 4,500,000 guilders in 1897, fell to less than 1,000,000 guilders in 1898 and during the calendar year just closing amounts to scarcely a third of that amount. The American acquisition of Hawaii and closer relations with the Antilles as a result of the war have upset the sugar world.

The advances in the prices of tin, which went steadily on in 1898, have been continued in 1899. Banca, Billiton, and Straits, which were quoted at about 37 guilders, or $14.87, per 50 kilograms in December, 1897, being now about 70 guilders, or $28.14. The deliveries in the Netherlands amount to about 500,000 slabs a year.

The Standard Oil Company controls absolutely the importation of petroleum, the Russian product sold here cutting no figure at all. Petroleum is shipped here now in tank steamers, and not in barrels as formerly.

Amsterdam is now the first market in the world for peruvian bark, occupying the place formerly held by London before Ceylon abandoned the cultivation, to some extent, of cinchona for coffee, tea, and other characteristic cultures.

The cocoa business has been flourishing throughout the year. Shipments of this article to the United States have been large.

Shipments to the United States from Amsterdam have of late years amounted to about a million dollars a month, and have not shown a great deal of variation as regards valuation since 1895. The bulk of these shipments, or about half their total amount, have consisted of diamonds, tobacco, coffee, spices, and tin, the two very large items being tobacco and diamonds.

The effect on diamonds of the Dingley Tariff act, which reduces the import duty of the Wilson law from enables them to export large surpluses to foreign markets.

Money is plentiful everywhere, as the low rates of interest now prevailing clearly indicate, the public treasuries are well supplied with State funds, the private wealth of the people is steadily increasing, business generally is being conducted upon sound principles, there are fewer bills in circulation than has been the case at any former period of our commercial history, and the last year of the eighteen hundreds will close with a record of financial soundness and prosperity such as the colonies of Australasia have never previously enjoyed.

BUOYANT PROSPECTS FOR 1900.

Added to this cause for general congratulation there is the fact that the prospects for 1900 are equally buoyant and reassuring. An additional impetus has been given to their export trade by the outbreak of war with the Transvaal, and as I write orders are pouring in much faster than they can be complied with for the consignment of food supplies, such as frozen meat, preserved beef and mutton, wheat flour, oats, &c., besides fodder and horses, to South Africa. Outside of this unexpected demand, however, the export trade of the colonies has assumed gigantic proportions; and concurrently with this increased output the import trade has been marked by a proportionate swelling in volume. A good margin of value still remains on the side of exports, and there is not one of the colonies that does not send away considerably more than it receives from foreign markets.

Readers of THE NEW YORK TIMES will be naturally interested to learn what the development of American trade has been in these latitudes. From the Customs Department I learn that in 1894 the total imports to New Zealand from the east and west coast ports of the United States came to a total value of £394,691, while the value of exports from New Zealand to the United States represented £287,196. In 1895 the value of imports from the United States was £394,233, and the exports to the United States £316,389. The records two years later show that the imports nearly doubled over those of 1895, amounting to £628,044, while the exports came to £375,096. In 1898 the imports came to £800,411, and our exports nearly doubled the previous year's record by jumping to £623,133. It will thus be seen that the value of imports from the United States nearly doubled in four years, and that New Zealand increased her exports from £287,196 in 1894 to £623,133 in 1898. The figures for the current year are not yet available, but from inquiries at the Custom House and information obtained from the largest importing firms in the colony from America clearly indicate that so far as eleven months of the present year are concerned the imports from America will be largely in excess of those of last year, while the exports will also show a considerable augmentation. Now it must be remembered that New Zealand is only one of the colonies of Australasia, with a population of little more than 750,000. Including Tasmania, the colonies on the Australian Continent contain about 4,000,000 of inhabitants. Therefore it is reasonable to assume that the other colonies united will import goods from America on an extent four times greater than New Zealand, as American houses are pushing their trade quite as diligently in Australia as in New Zealand.

THE NEW STEAMSHIP LINES.

Until the past two or three years, with the exception of the San Francisco mail service, shipments of goods were received from and sent to America in inferior wooden craft of small tonnage. These shipments came to hand and were dispatched at very irregular intervals, and there was nothing like a sustained effort to secure a really permanent footing in colonial markets for American products. The enormous development has therefore come about through the establishment of the present regular steamship services between American ports and Australasia. This service was established in October of last year, and, owing to the particularly keen competition between the Tyser Line and the shipping people opposed to it, the freight quotations are in New York, the rates of freight have been brought down to a particularly low figure. As low as 10s per ton has been quoted on the carriage of general merchandise from New York to the principal ports in New Zealand and other colonies. This has had the effect of diverting a very large amount of business from Great Britain and the Continent to America, and the American people are benefiting accordingly. In fact the freight rates now ruling from America are fully 50 per cent. below the quotations made by the regular lines on the carriage of goods from the United Kingdom or the Continent to New Zealand. Goods can be landed from New York at any of the leading New Zealand ports as cheaply as goods are being carried by the local shipping companies from one New Zealand port to another, involving a run of but twelve or eighteen hours; and instances have been known where goods have been shipped from London to New York, transshipped there, and landed in New Zealand at a less cost than if they had come from London direct. Prior to the opening up of this steam service not more than eight or nine sailing vessels from America visited the New Zealand ports in the course of the year. Now we have a regular monthly service of steamers, some of a gross capacity of 10,000 tons, and at New Zealand and Australian ports these steamers are having offered to them far more goods than they can carry. It has been predicted by the shipping combination in New York that the Tyser Line would tire of this freight war, but the latter expresses their fixed determination to continue in the service. It is of course to the advantage of American producers and colonial consumers that these low rates should be maintained, but should this keen competition collapse and freights be increased, American products have obtained such a firm grasp of the colonial markets that a continued demand for them is assured. It will only mean that the American manufacturer will have to make a proportionate increase upon the invoiced prices, and that the colonial merchant, and after him the retailer, will have to exact the amount of difference from their customers. But no increase of freight can be so great as to appreciably affect the flow of American importations into these markets.

AMERICAN GOODS FAVORED.

I was at some pains to ascertain what the feelings of the mercantile community are in regard to the estimation in which American consignments are held by themselves and their customers, and with that object consulted many of the leading business men, Chairmen of Chambers of Commerce, and Presidents of industrial associations. The general consensus of opinion is that American goods generally are increasing in favor and demand. Not so very long ago there was a strong prejudice against most things American, and the "Yankee article," as it was termed, was almost universally considered, without actual experience of it, to be vastly inferior to the British production in the same line. That prejudice has been so completely overcome that in many lines a distinct preference is shown for American goods over those imported from Great Britain and the Continent, and the head of one of the very largest importing firms in New Zealand emphasized the fact by exclaiming, "Believe me, Sir, American trade has come here to stay."

I have found in the course of my inquiries that business men on this side of the Pacific appreciate the way in which American firms are disposed to carry on trading relations with them. Mr. Harold Beauchamp, the active partner and general manager of the old-established firm of W. M. Bannatyne & Co., which does a larger import business with America than any other house in Wellington, has recently returned from a visit to the United States and Canada, and is loud in his appreciation of business methods in the States. He tells me that all the firms he came in contact with showed a ready disposition to meet his wishes and to comply with the requirements of the colonial market in every possible way that could be suggested. Other traders have expressed themselves in similar terms, and some have gone so far as to say that they prefer doing business with American houses even where there is a slight percentage of difference in cost over goods of equal quality from Great Britain and the Continent. In all cases equal conditions as to cost and quality would sway the pendulum of preference against Continental importations; but in a majority of instances national feeling and sentiment would tell in favor of productions from the mother land, although some firms would sooner deal with America on account of the more satisfactory and up-to-date methods which American firms display in the transaction of business.

AUSTRALIAN TARIFFS.

As bearing largely upon the question of American trade with the colonies, the matter of tariffs must of course be referred to. In most of the colonies of Australasia the fiscal policy adopted is more or less protectionist. New South Wales is the only one that has hitherto maintained a free trade system, but this will be altered next year when Australian federation is consummated. The new dominion is certain to adopt a moderately protective tariff as against the outside world. In New Zealand protection has been in force for many years, and that policy is not at all likely to be departed from by the new Parliament, except perhaps to remove a few of the anomalies that are found to exist in some of the duties that are now imposed, but these alterations will in no way materially affect American trade. Protection is resorted to by New Zealand for two objects: To bring revenue into the State Treasury and to foster local industry and manufacture. But, although New Zealand is protectionist, she has prudently abstained from entering into arrangements with any country—not even Great Britain—by which the goods of that country would have preferential treatment over those of any other nation in respect to the payment of customs duties. Some years ago an attempt was made to introduce preferential duties on reciprocal lines with South Australia, but the proposal was never seriously entertained. This "open door" policy has placed her markets at the disposal of all nations upon equal terms, and it is their own lookout if American producers are steadily forging ahead for paramountcy.

In looking through the long list of commodities that find their way to New Zealand and Australasia from America kerosene oil occupies a very prominent position. There is an enormous consumption of kerosene oil throughout the whole of the colonies, but a diminution is threatened by the gradual adoption of electric lighting, by the manifest improvement and growing favor of coal gas through the introduction of the incandescent principle, and by the imitation of acetylene gas. There is a difficulty about the latter through the inability of colonial houses to obtain the necessary supply of carbide of calcium from America, where they are informed it cannot be made fast enough to supply the requirements of the local markets in that country. Until this supply can be obtained any increase in the use of acetylene gas will be checked, though as an illuminant acetylene gas is held in higher esteem than electric light, coal gas, or kerosene. Against the lessened consumption of kerosene which threatens in the large cities and populous towns must be set out the increased demand which naturally arises through the closer settlement of country districts and the opening up of the back blocks to settlers. Putting the increase in these places against the decrease in the cities and towns, kerosene will continue to hold a prominent place in the importations from America. Every gallon has to pay an import duty of 6d. It is at this moment selling in Wellington at 12s 6d a case, containing two four-gallon tins.

BOOT AND SHOE TRADE.

There is no line of American manufactures which has taken such a firm hold of the colonial markets as boots and shoes. Importation of these articles has made marvelous strides within a very short period. About five years ago not more than 2 per cent. of the boots and shoes brought into New Zealand came from America. At the present time it is safe to say that this trade has increased to 33 1-3 per cent., and in Australia to over 50 per cent. In both New Zealand and Victoria the boot trade has been protected to an extent that the framers of the tariff believed to be almost prohibitory, in order to encourage local manufacture and the employment of colonial labor, but in spite of this American importation has assumed the dimensions already indicated. In New Zealand there is an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. on imported boots and shoes, but really it comes to 27½. Say, an invoice represents a consignment of boots and shoes to the value of £100, the Custom House adds another £10, and then charges 25 per cent. on £110, and the duty paid on that consignment comes to £27 10s. One would imagine that no foreign country could possibly compete with protection of this character, but the fact remains that America is doing it, and doing it successfully, placing on the colonial market a better finished article and underselling the local manufacturer 5 or 6 shillings on the single pair of boots or shoes. It is more particularly in women's boots and shoes that the American importations have made such headway, but they are also successfully invading the market in men's supplies. If the present rate of progress continues, manufacturers will be compelled to cease making boots and shoes altogether and narrow down their operations to the importing, distributing, and repairing branches of the trade. They are further handicapped by the protective duty upon leather for the encouragement of the local tanneries, and upon any manufactured skins or leather they may require they have to pay considerable import duties, as much, for instance, as 2d. per pound upon sole leather. At one time England and her colonies depended mainly upon France for what are known as "glassy kid" lines, but now the trade has been diverted almost exclusively to America, whose system of tanning is admitted to be superior to those of any other country. The existence of the rinderpest in South Africa and of the tick plague in Queensland and New South Wales has placed colonial manufacturers at the further disadvantage of having to pay more than they used to do for locally tanned hides. In addition to this, American firms have sent representatives to New Zealand who are purchasing hides and regularly sending large consignments to the United States. In the boot and shoe trade Canada has also been competing with the United States since the opening of the Vancouver mail service, but the American product holds the sway, so much so indeed that Continental importations have been reduced to a mere bagatelle, while the productions of Great Britain are losing ground month by month. Under all these circumstances it can readily be conceived that the lot of the colonial manufacturer of boots and shoes, like the policeman's in comic opera, is not a happy one.

Canada has likewise entered into competition with America in these markets with regard to agricultural machinery, bicycles, canned goods, furniture, &c. American furniture is making slow headway, and its progress will not be encouraging so long as the import duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, with 10 per cent. added on invoice, is maintained. Under these conditions American furniture cannot successfully compete with the local supplies.

BRITISH TRADE WANING.

It may be said generally that in cotton fabrics, leather goods, agricultural machinery, railway iron, locomotives, carriages, fittings, mining machinery, and printing machines the import trade of New Zealand and most of the other colonies is steadily going from England to America. There is not a doubt that the tide has set in this direction, and that American trade with Australasia will increase more and more as time goes on and as America gets more acquainted with the needs of the colonies and adapts her manufactures to colonial requirements and taste, and this the Americans are now generally trying to do. The idea entertained a few years ago was that American goods were generally cheap and trashy, but that notion is now exploded, and it is found that she can send out goods equal in all respects to anything of a similar kind manufactured in England and place them on the colonial markets at quotations which are in favor of America.

The United States does a large volume of trade with the colonies in manufactured tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes. One Wellington firm alone imports annually from 1,800 to 2,000 cases of tobacco, each weighing on an average 176 pounds. Nearly all the newspapers of New Zealand are drawing their supplies of printing paper from America. Lager beer is also in increasing demand. The imports of resin, lumber, reapers and binders, American notions, and Baldwin steam engines are also on the increase, and, speaking generally, American importations are having a very serious effect on the shipment of English goods to this part of the world in all lines of production.

THE HARDWARE TRADE.

In all branches of the hardware trade of the colonies America as a source of supply is assuming a very commanding position. Speaking yesterday to the active partner of the largest firm of importers of machinery and hardware in New Zealand and Australia, he assured me that generally the hardware trade is prosperous, but owing to the enormous advance in metals, and this being probably the most irresponsive or sluggish market, they were simply getting advances upon the cost of their stocks, and not obtaining what the goods would now actually cost to land. He feels assured that these high rates for pig iron will last for the first six months of 1900, but eventually firms are going to get advances upon the cost of imported goods. They find, as regards hardware, that British manufacturers are so full with orders that they will have to turn to America for supplies. American hardware catches on ever quicker in New Zealand than in Australia, and people are apt to take up new lines and notions from America. Regarding standard lines it is mostly a matter of price, but everything being equal, firms will buy from England, but if Americans can show any slight advantage they will purchase in America. The only complaint they make is that as regards standard lines the Americans are not so eager to meet the requirements of the trade here as they are with reference to their "notions" or smaller lines. That is to say, they want colonial firms to accept their manufactures of standard lines whether they are used to their particular styles and measurements or not. This, however, is expected to right itself in course of time.

In corrugated iron, for instance, if American manufacturers would accommodate their style and measurement to the standard 3-inch corrugations, which we prefer to the 2½-inch, they would do well. New Zealand imports about 10,000 tons of corrugated iron annually from America, and the import to Australia comes to about 50,000 tons. Then again as regards fencing wire, enormous quantities of which find their way to New Zealand and Australia, Americans put up what they call "catchweights," and the reels have to be weighed out here to ascertain the exact quantity. The English manufacturer will produce his hundredweight of wire in one piece, whereas the American product is sometimes in two or three pieces. These when joined together produce an ugly knot in the fencing wire. Colonial importers would prefer to have the wire in exact weights—say in hundred-weight coils (112 pounds)—and they would also like to have the prices quoted in English money instead of dollars and cents.

I give these hints to American manufacturers in order that they may profit by them, as it is believed they will do, it being now recognized by most people having trade relations with them that Americans are always on the alert to meet their customers in every possible way.

From what I have now written it will be seen that American trade with the colonies is increasing with rapid strides; and my knowledge of the orders now going forth and in contemplation convinces me that the trading transactions between America and Australasia will show an enormous expansion during 1900.

J. GRATTON GREY.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

SYDNEY, Nov. 22.—Regarding the general outlook in this part of Australia the outlook may thus be epitomized: All the colonies have largely recovered from the disastrous effects of the commercial and financial crisis of a few years back, and have begun a new epoch of exceptional industrial and commercial activity and prosperity. Business generally is in a thoroughly sound condition, prices of commodities having a tendency to advance. Imported leathers have already gone up 10 per cent. and higher. The building trades in town and country, especially in Victoria and New South Wales, are more active than for many years past, and the demand for soft lumber is likely to be fully maintained, with a tendency to expand.

Copious rains in all parts of the colonies have largely benefited the pastoral and agricultural interests, but three or four favorable seasons will be required to replace the heavy losses of stock occasioned by recent droughts, and until this is effected the shortage of wool and frozen meat must continue.

The market for American goods, especially agricultural implements and machinery, continues good, and is not likely to be adversely affected by any federal tariff which may be imposed. The use of kerosene is extending, the long-continued prejudice in some parts of the colonies against the use of oil stoves having almost disappeared.

The attempt to substitute Japanese printing paper for the American article has resulted in failure. The demand for American paper continues steady.

It is noticeable that in several lines of American goods Australasian requirements have been more closely studied than heretofore.

Should the Sydney electric tramway system prove successful, a largely increased demand for materials and appliances will inevitably follow. The difficulties connection with the construction of the Sydney electric tramways is leading the Australian Governments to favorably consider the suggestion that such works should be tendered for by American firms of repute.

Should the Sydney-San Francisco service be improved as proposed, an impetus will be afforded trade between Australasia and the United States.

There are indications that New South Wales is about to borrow largely for the purposes of railway construction and the completion of various public works, and should such be the case American manufacturers will have a chance of securing large contracts for iron rails.

The Australasian public revenues generally are in a healthy condition, and there is every prospect of a prolonged condition of this encouraging state of affairs.

CONDITIONS IN CUBA.

According to the consensus of opinion among business men having trade with Cuba, conditions in the island are generally unsettled. This is attributed chiefly to the uncertainty as to the island's future government, and the sentiment in favor of annexation is common among merchants. Added to this, as a cause of unsatisfactory trade, is the fact that through death and migration the island was partially depopulated during the insurrection and war, while the remaining population as a whole is poor. Trade is mainly confined to the cities. The country sections are buying little, and until agriculture has resumed a more normal condition and agriculturalists have money with which to buy, no great improvement is looked for. With the sugar plantations destroyed and their machinery plants wrecked, some time will be required for their restoration, as well as for capital to regain confidence, the latter awaiting a stable Government. A start has been made, however, on tobacco and on fruit. Indeed, it is expected that this year New York will again have the red bananas which have not been seen in the New York market since the time when the insurrection in Cuba attained to considerable proportions.

Leonard J. Busby of Holt & Co., flour merchants, said of trade in Cuba: "Our exports are not over 50 per cent. of what they normally should be. The population has decreased very much, and the average of that remaining is very poor. There is very little money sent from here for investment. The Cubans are, however, making a considerable effort with tobacco plantations. Probably another year will mark something of a stride. Sugar has been entirely neglected—not only the plantations, but their machine houses. Now they are waiting for the coming of American capital. There is plenty waiting an assured American Government in the island. If the Government remains Cuban, no business men will put money in the hands of the people."

A. F. Lopez of V. Lopez & Co., who ship butter to Cuba, said: "As nearly as I can learn, little real prosperity is looked for until cane can be again planted and ground. That means capital, but the uncertainty with regard to the future Government is keeping capital away. The condition of the island has improved in a year, however, and we look for better trade during the coming year. In the eastern district the iron mines have come to the front. That has helped Santiago and given employment to many men. Under Gen. Wood's management of the island's Government we look for a very great improvement."

A. Fernandez, commission merchant, of 99 Water Street, said: "One cause of bad trade so far as export to Cuba is concerned is that in many lines the island was overstocked. The large dealers in produce, particularly, sending their goods on consignment. In the early part of the year you could get lard, bacon, and ham in Cuba cheaper than you could in New York."

Ysidoro Pendas of Y. Pendas & Alvarez, cigar manufacturers, said: "It is too early yet to speak of the tobacco crop. We must wait about forty days. The amount planted is about twice that of last year. That is due to the fact that more capital has been attracted. Of course this improved condition in tobacco must benefit the people, by giving work. What effect the crop will have on the tobacco leaf market, is, however, a thing that we cannot tell until we see what kind of a crop it is going to be."

Another business man having extensive relations with Cuban trade, who takes a more cheerful view of existing conditions in the island, said: "Conditions are changed. Formerly a great deal of flour, bacon, beans, jerked beef, and such goods were sent to Cuba. To-day there are sent more beef, canned goods, preserves, and delicacies. It would seem as though our going in there has changed the tastes of the people. While there has doubtless been an increase of American exports to Cuba, much of the staple food products are being sent by way of new lines from the Gulf ports, and New York suffers correspondingly. The power of rehabilitation shown by Cuba is wonderful. It was the same after the Ten Years' War as after the late one. Already the soil is giving up new crops, and many plantations are resuming their old-time appearance. Factories are opening and business is resuming a more normal condition. Nevertheless the possibilities will not come to be realized until political conditions are settled. I believe that annexation is Cuba's only salvation. The United States is the only country that can take its sugar, tobacco, and fruits. If Cuba remains independent and the same tariffs apply to the United States as to other countries, and if there is a virtual free trade with Puerto Rico, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Philippines, what is to become of Cuba? A remarkable feature of the present situation in Cuba is the large immigration. The old inhabitants who left during the insurrection and Spanish-American war are returning, while English, French, Spanish, and Germans are settling in the islands in much greater numbers than are Americans."

PUERTO RICO.

Henry T. Knowlton, Treasurer of the New York and Porto Rico Steamship Company, of which his firm—Miller, Bull & Knowlton—are agents, said there was nothing new in the condition of affairs in Puerto Rico. "The island," said he, "is waiting for free trade with this country. The people of the island are taking what they need and nothing more. Last month this Government took the duty off flour, pork, beef, rough lumber, and several other articles imported in the island, and that has to an extent increased our exports to Puerto Rico. There is, however, the same duty on imports from the island to this country that has always existed, and until the island is put upon a Territorial basis there will not be much further increase in trade. I may say that there are more Americans of means going to the island than ever before, and they go to investigate the business possibilities. Many are interested in fruit and vegetable cultivation, and they are looking into the prospects, which are certainly of the very best. We have a large number of tourists booked for the next three months, who will travel on our two new steamers, the Ponce and San Juan. We have built two other new steamers during the year, and are now building a wharf at San Juan. The population of Puerto Rico is getting over the effects of the hurricane of the Summer."

While the condition of trade with the island has not developed to the dimensions to which it is expected to with more favorable tariff regulations between the island and the States, Mr. Knowlton called attention to the fact that our exports to Puerto Rico have doubled since the war.

BRITISH WEST INDIES.

Trinidad and Grenada the Most Prosperous of the Group—Reciprocity Treaties Greatly Needed by Others.

The business and financial conditions of the British West Indies at the opening of the year 1900, while far from being bright, are not without promise. Essentially agricultural countries, their commerce necessarily centres in and is wholly dependent on the industrial situation. And this exhibits signs of improvement in many important directions, albeit not to the extent that one might desire or even have reasonably hoped for before the temporary additional misfortunes of the late hurricanes overtook some of the islands. For the rest, whatever element of doubt there might be about the future is not the result of weak or uncertain potential resources. It is referable rather to the uncertainty that still involves the future trade relations of the islands with the United States. It is scarcely any exaggeration to say that for the immediate future their trade and industry depend on the fate of the reciprocity treaties now pending before the United States Congress.

This applies specially to Jamaica, almost all of whose exports go to the American markets, while over half of her imports are drawn thence. Whatever may be the ultimate result of Jamaica's efforts to open an alternative fruit trade with Great Britain, for the present, she is dependent on the United States; consequently she watches with deep apprehension the progress of the Western crusade against the ratification of her reciprocity treaty. For the present, speaking generally, latest official reports are cheerful and even optimistic as to the satisfactory character of the trade outlook for the new year. Of course the recent hurricane and floods, besides materially damaging the big fruit plantations, seriously affected the small settlers, who constitute the bulk of the industrial population. But this is transient. Given good relations with the United States and the prospect makes for a very bright year. Merchants seem to be banking on it.

The Leeward Islands are said to have suffered abnormal trade decline last year, but are developing brighter prospects, except Montserrat, which is ruined. There was a large decrease in the trade with America ports, due to sugar crop shortage, but this is already exhibiting signs of revival, and the people are anxious to establish better general relations. This especially applies to Dominica, the most prosperous of the group for its varied resources and the more enterprising character of its people.

Trinidad, now the most prosperous of the colonies, is experiencing a phenomenal trade revival. Every branch of industry and trade is booming, as the Governor points out in a special report. To such an extent is this so that the colony has rejected the American reciprocity treaty, alleging its independent prosperity as the reason.

Barbados, Guiana, and the Windward Islands present no special features calling for comment. These for the most part continue in a parlous condition, struggling for bare industrial life with the sugar crisis, and more or less pitifully seeking to secure help from the United States as the only available market, at almost any sacrifice. In this respect they are worse off than Jamaica, yet their trade continues to be worth something. This specially applies to Guiana, with her vast undeveloped resources inviting foreign capital.

Grenada furnishes an interesting exception, and calls for special notice. Unlike its neighbors, it enjoys a prosperity similar to that of Trinidad, but it furnishes the unique example of the only truly colored colony under British rule—that is, the only one where colored men have a history. There to-day the negro is supreme, since of 62,000 inhabitants over 60 are Europeans and under 300 are white "creoles." The wealth, influence, energy, and ideas of the negroes dominate.

MEXICO.

CITY OF MEXICO, Dec. 20.—Twenty-five years ago there was but one railway in operation in the republic—the Mexican—connecting the port of Vera Cruz with the capital. To-day three trunk lines, with numerous branches, connect the northern frontier with the centre of the republic, while other iron roads traverse the rich tropical and semi-tropical regions lying to the south, east, and west of the capital. The network of railways is continually expanding, and soon there will be few regions of this rich and favored land that will not be accessible by rail.

Though a beginning has barely been made toward unearthing the fabulous mineral wealth still hidden in the mountains of Mexico, many new mines are continually being opened, millions of money is being invested in this industry, and thousands of tons of modern machinery are being imported and installed yearly. Only a short time since the Rothschilds secured control of the now famous group of Inguaran copper mines in the State of Michoacan, from which they will build a railroad several hundred miles in length, to the Pacific, as an outlet for the product of these rich mines. During the fiscal year ended on June 30, 1899, there were 953 mining titles issued, covering a surface of 13,000 hectares, or over 32,000 acres, and on the same date there were in force 8,970 other mining titles covering an area of 84,557 hectares, or 208,940 acres.

There are now hundreds of manufacturing plants scattered over the republic, mainly of cotton goods, woolens, paper, iron, soap, candles, &c., and nearly all paying enormous dividends. All the machinery for these plants and for the new ones which are continually being erected is imported, as well as a great portion of the raw material.

With the improvement in agricultural conditions, the absolute security of life and property, the cheapness of labor, the absence of strikes, and the confidence in the strength and stability of the Government, only lately exemplified in the recent conversion of the debt by means of the 5 per cent. loan in the United States and Europe, it is plain that there exist exceptional opportunities for American manufacturers and merchants for the improvement and extension of trade in this Republic. The importations during the last fiscal year were over $50,000,000, of which only a little over $12,000,000 came from the United States. During the same period machinery to the value of $5,439,233 was imported.

Private enterprise is investing large sums in utilizing the magnificent water power existing in many parts of the republic, (formerly almost entirely neglected,) for industrial purposes, with special reference to the production of electrical power.

Municipal improvements are being instituted and carried out everywhere, such as modern market houses, theatres, electric-light plants, water works, and improved systems of drainage.

American manufacturers seem to have failed to learn the lessons which their European competitors have long learned and practiced. In order to succeed in establishing a profitable trade in any line here prices must compare favorably with those of European houses; long credits must, as a rule, be given, the security being, in almost every case unexceptionable. Agencies or branch houses should be established, when practicable, and the management of these intrusted to men thoroughly conversant with the language, customs, character, and requirements of the people. The Mexican is conservative, and it is not easy to persuade him to change; but for the same reason, once convinced, he will be apt to remain true, at least for a long time, to his new love.

Great care should be taken by American shippers in packing their goods properly, in familiarising themselves with the Mexican customs regulations and rules, and in being prompt to fill orders once accepted, getting the best possible terms for their customers from the transportation companies.

SOUTH AFRICA.

During the past year, and indeed for some three years previous, trade in South Africa has been on the decline. At the time of the failure of the Jameson raid the country appeared a land of such Good Hope as it had never appeared before, and that unfortunate mistake may be regarded as the termination of a period of prosperity.

At present, owing to the war in which the whole of South Africa is involved, trade is, of course, utterly disorganised, and there is demand for little more than the bare necessities of existence. The requirements in this direction have increased, for the many thousands of British and colonial troops which have arrived, and are continuing to arrive, more than equal the loss in the regular population. For the necessities of life South Africa is in the main dependent on external sources, and the Governments of Cape Colony and Natal have therefore temporarily suspended the duties on imported meat. From this suspension Australia, which is in many items a competitor with America for the trade of South Africa, will greatly benefit.

South Africa is not a wheat-raising country. How far it could be made to be such is not easy to say. The Cape now raises in a year about enough to support the colony for five months, Natal hardly produces any wheat, while but a small proportion of the Transvaal is suited to the cultivation of wheat. Rhodesia is fertile, and it may be expected that in a few years the territory of the British Chartered Company will furnish a good deal of food supplies for the rest of the country.

During the past few years South African importers have been fairly successful. In the export trade to this country America is to the fore, her trade with South Africa having grown enormously. In 1891-92 it amounted to £280,000, while last year it was more than £2,000,000.

South Africa is not at present a manufacturing country, and opinions differ as to whether it could ever become one of any considerable degree. Of the Cape it has been said that it produces nothing but bricks and bread. Wine and brandy could, however, be added, for these industries are the oldest of the country, with the exception of mining. Next comes the wagon industry, carried on principally at Wellington and the Paarl, Dutch districts within easy reach of Cape Town. This country does not produce the great quantity and variety of woods found in America and Australia, but the wood used in wagon making is said to be particularly suitable for the purpose. In this industry America has also stepped in, and may reasonably expect an increased demand for her wagons, though the Dutch pooh-pooh the American article. The war will cause a vast amount of destruction of wagons, so that as soon as it is over the demand for imported as well as domestic wagons will be considerable.

The importations of boots from America, especially in Johannesburg, are considerable. Not so much, however, is done in leather. The product of the local tanneries is for the most part of very inferior description. With the increase of immigration which may naturally be expected after the war is over, there will, of course, be an increased demand for leather goods, but there is no possibility of educating the average Boer up to the use of properly tanned boots.

In the Transvaal the manufacture of leather, as well as of boots and shoes, is one of the concessions enjoyed by Messrs. Lewis and Marks. There have been instances where newly arrived Uitlanders, ignorant of the peculiar economic regulations of the Transvaal, have gone so far as to make pits and get everything in readiness to start tanneries before they were enlightened as to their errors. The monopoly is known as the Transvaal Leather Company and is naturally flourishing. But in spite of, the duties intended to be prohibitive, of leather and leather goods, large quantities of imported goods find their way into the Transvaal.

A deputation recently waited on the Premier of Cape Colony, and represented the desirability of imposing a protective tariff in order to develop manufactures. But although it is believed by some that it would be possible to make Cape Colony the manufacturing and supplying factor in the development of South Africa, the possibility of a protective tariff appears very remote.

The opinion of J. W. Jagger, President of the Cape Town Chamber of Commerce, is that as soon as the war is over a great impetus will be given to trade throughout the whole of South Africa. He points out that there is a great amount of local capital at present locked up, and that there will be a great influx of foreign capital and of immigration. Relieved of many restrictions which hitherto have hampered it, the mining industry of the Transvaal will go ahead and Rhodesia will greatly develop. Mr. Jagger's opinion is in agreement with the ideas of the Presidents of other Chambers of Commerce in South Africa with whom, in the present state of the country, it has been possible to communicate.

Cape Town, Dec. 1, 1899.

IN THE FAR EAST.

Everett Frazar, Consul General for Korea and President of the American Asiatic Association, gives the following résumé of conditions in the Far East:

"There is no positive change in the conditions in China, but there has been a large advance in the amount of business done. This applies especially to our domestics, locomotives, and manufactures generally. In our domestics there is a natural expansion of trade because of their superiority, and the absence of sizing and filling, which amount to from 10 to 15 per cent. in the goods of European manufacture. The actual wear of the American goods also proves to the Chinese that they cannot do as well in any other market of the world. There has been a great increase in the shipments of flour, wheat, and other breadstuffs from the Pacific Coast, which has the advantage of quicker and cheaper freight connections. These articles have largely supplanted the old-time food supply of rice, the main dependence of the natives from time immemorial.

"Machinery, locomotives, ironwork, and railway ties from Puget Sound have shown a markedly increased demand in the past two years. With the development of the present railways, of the lines surveyed, and for those for which concessions have been obtained, there will be a still larger demand, and this country in nearly all departments will receive the greatest benefits in the matter of these supplies.

"In Japan, the stringency of the money market has restricted the expansion in trade which was current two years ago, but this may be overcome in the near future. As compared with five or six or more years ago, there has, however, been a wonderful increase in trade, and this country has had its full and larger share of all such business.

"In Korea, also, the opening of steam and trolley railroads with electric lighting and the improved and largely increased use of American refined petroleum with convenient, cheap Japan-made lamps, have the expected effects upon the people, by giving them individual experiences of our modern improvements and civilization generally, all of which has been favorable toward the fuller development of that empire, the last to enter the country of Occidental nations.

"In the Philippines, a vastly improved trade as compared with that conducted by the Spaniards but a few years since is bound to show itself as soon as the last of the insurrection is stamped out, and the various ports on the coast made available, where either deep draught steamships can load, or where at least native craft can ship products from the interior for the three principal export ports, Manila, Iloilo, and Cebu. From these ports all parts of the world will be able to draw their supplies.

"Naturally our own citizens should and will have the first opportunity for developing this trade. Being but 680 miles distant from Hongkong and the gateway to all our trade with China, with docks and naval stations at Manila we can scarcely estimate the importance of these Islands to us at the present time and in the near future. The $20,000,000 paid by our Government to Spain will, I believe, by judicious management on the part of Congress, be well repaid by the revenue derived from year to year, and in a reasonable time.

"In shipping between the Pacific Coast and the Far East there has been a wonderful increase in demand for tonnage owing to this expansion in our trade. All existing lines are fully engaged for many months ahead. The addition of the new and large steamers of the Pacific Mail Company will prove very acceptable both for the convenience of passengers and the carrying of cargoes."

Southern Representation.

The Jackson (Miss.) correspondent of The New Orleans Picayune says: "Without blare of trumpets, Senator Money is securing data to combat the Crumpacker bill to reduce Southern representation in Congress and to the Electoral College. It is generally believed here that if such a bill should pass, President McKinley would not approve it."

EXPERTS DISCUSS SOME INDUSTRIES

General Prosperity in the Country Is Reflected in the Manufactories—New Plants Being Planned.

American Shipbuilding.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES
By LEWIS NIXON.

Once the ships for our foreign trade were built in American shipyards and shipbuilding and ship owning were among the most important sources of National wealth and prosperity. To-day the American merchant marine in the foreign trade has practically disappeared.

The supply of the cheap raw material in the form of great forests in the early years of the Republic gave us an initial advantage in shipbuilding which enabled us to build ships cheaper than they could be built in Europe, and a system of discrimination by which a lower duty was paid on goods brought in American ships filled American bottoms with profitable cargoes.

By the time the effect of cheaper vessels and profitable operation began to place the American merchant marine in the forefront upon the sea we began to pile up treaties with almost every nation, the effect of which has been to reduce our merchant marine, alone of all our great National interests, to an even footing with the cheap labor nations of the world.

When England by the prior development of steel-making and steel-working industries could produce a metal vessel that was commercially superior to our wooden ones, she rapidly pushed her way to the front in the markets of the world, and, aided by the opportunities of our four years' war, she soon monopolized the carrying trade upon the ocean.

To-day we see our country again the chief producer of the new raw material, steel, and the leader in the metal-working arts, and history has a strange way of repeating itself, as the pendulum swings back and forth.

If it were simply a question of first cost, the natural resources of this great country would soon solve the problem of the rehabilitation of our merchant marine, and by so doing keep at home by paying to our own people the vast sum of $300,000,000 which we now pour annually into foreign coffers as the cost of unwise and unpatriotic legislation and treaty-making.

The question which confronts us is not a problem of shipbuilding or ship owning, but of profitable operation.

The disparity between this country and Europe in the matter of cost of operating ships of like classes exists in full force—in sufficient force to be practically prohibitory. For this reason and for this alone the facilities of the American shipbuilder are not to any considerable extent, or with any encouraging continuity, called into requisition by the American ship owner. This is not because the American ship owner does not desire new ships, but because, under existing conditions of competition with rivals receiving substantial aid from their respective countries, he could not operate them profitably if he had them. We must always, no matter from what point of view the situation is surveyed, arrive at the conclusion that the future of American shipbuilding in any large sense depends upon the future of American trade over sea, and that the future of over-sea traffic is wholly in the hands of National statecraft and diplomacy.

The rehabilitation of our merchant marine is not a party question. Jefferson drew the act which was signed by Washington after it passed the first Congress of the United States, limiting the right of American register to American ships, and this law should never be repealed, as with far-seeing and patriotic inspiration principles were laid down in that law that are even more vital to us now than in the beginning of this Republic.

A ship with an extended coast full of splendid harbors, and an export and import trade of vast and rapidly increasing volume, and which has no merchant marine, is undeveloped, and is subject and tributary to the nations who do its carrying.

What we need is a policy under which Americans can afford to own and operate ships, giving rise to a liberal and increasing demand for vessels based upon a growing foreign trade in American bottoms, and enough co-operation among our shipbuilders to present a solid front to the foreign competitor without interfering in any way with domestic competition. Such a policy would be of immediate benefit to every calling, profession, and trade in the United States, and add without delay to our National wealth and independence.

It would give work and markets to our people at home and opportunities for our youth abroad.

Free ships will not avail; discriminating duties are barred by treaty. Let Republican and Democrat unite upon some common National policy, and the results will be even greater for the glory and prosperity of all our people than when hand in hand the two great parties joined to produce our new navy.

Shoe and Leather Industries.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES
By FREDERICK F. PURDY,
Managing Editor Shoe and Leather Reporter.

The general prosperity of the country the past year has been fully reflected in the shoe and leather trade. The production of shoes was never as great as in 1899. The shipments from Boston, whence the great bulk of the shoes made in New England are forwarded to their destination, were some 400,000 cases more than in 1898, an increase which is unparalleled in the history of the industry. The expansion of production was fully as great proportionately in the West. A number of new factories were built and many old ones enlarged.

While the trade was abundantly satisfactory in volume, the profits were cut down materially. Shoe manufacturers were scarcely able at any time to get a full equivalent for the advance which they had been obliged to pay for leather and most other shoe materials. The custom of selling shoes at fixed prices is so general throughout the trade that the advance was with difficulty established. A beginning was made, as usual, in taking whatever was possible out of the quality of the shoes.

The advance in prices of leather, however, proceeded to such an extent that this practice soon failed to do everything that was required, and prices of shoes began slowly to rise. Many of the shoe manufacturers met in convention in Philadelphia in August, organized a National association, and passed resolutions declaring their purpose to advance their prices in proportion to the rise in materials. They convened in Boston again in November to perfect their organization. The shoe manufacturers of the country are so numerous that a majority of them are not yet connected with the association, but the moral effect of their action and ut

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS VICAR

Services at St. John's Chapel in Honor of the Rev. P. A. H. Brown.

Dr. Morgan Dix Eulogizes the Clergyman and the Way He Has Performed His Duty.

Special services in commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the vicarate of the Rev. Philip A. H. Brown were held yesterday in St. John's Chapel, Trinity Parish. The old church was filled both morning and evening with members of the congregation, and many old communicants who have long since moved uptown. In the throng were many clergymen and vestrymen of Trinity Parish. Among them were the Rev. Leighton Coleman, D. D., Bishop of Maryland, who is a cousin of the vicar; the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, the Rev. Dr. Theodore Riley of the General Theological Seminary, the Rev. Samuel S. Mitchell, vicar of St. Chrysostom's Chapel; Col. William Jay, Edmund Randolph, Elihu Chauncey, Frederick Clarkson, Hicks Arnold, S. Edward Nash, Francis S. Bangs, and other prominent laymen of Trinity Parish.

The testimonial of the congregation of St. John's to its vicar took the form of a beautifully designed silver alms plate, the following inscription appearing on the reverse of the rim:

"To the Glory of God and in Commemoration of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary in St. John's Chapel, Trinity Parish, New York City, of the Reverend Philip Auld Harrison Brown, M. A., Vivar, 1875-1900."

To the vicar was also presented by a member of his congregation an elaborately embroidered white silk stole. The souvenirs of the occasion were programmes containing the services of the day, bound in purple and gold covers, upon the centre of which appeared a photogravure of St. John's Chapel as it is to-day.

The Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix preached the morning sermon.

After commenting on the various phases of the day, Dr. Dix said: "The respected and beloved vicar of St. John's Chapel now celebrates the twenty-fifth anniversary of his connection with Trinity Parish has one of its clergy. I must proceed with caution in speaking of this incident. Much might be said in a man's absence which cannot properly be said in his presence, and they whom we would fain praise the most are the men who would forbid such expression and would be pained by the publicity of their merits. But if any one lives who would gladly open his mouth and speak what he feels on this occasion, it is myself, who for a quarter of a century and more have known this man as a brother and regarded him with a father's affection. It is only the restraint enforced by the position which prevents me from saying tenfold more than I shall.

"The service of which we speak began in 1871, when he was Deacon at St. Paul's Chapel. After an interval of some years, during which he was rector of Christ Church, Cooperstown, N. Y., he was called to our parish, being elected an assistant minister in December, 1874. Here, in old St. John's, with the Rev. Dr. Weston and the Rev. William H. Cooke, he began that work of which on their decease he became the head. Here has he stood to this hour, steady, calm, self-possessed, resolute, serving the Lord with a single heart in a field growing more and more difficult and less and less fruitful from day to day.

"There was a time when the place where we are now assembled was the fashionable quarter of the town. Here dwelt the rich and prosperous, their fine residences facing what was the most beautiful park in the city. This chapel, as we might say, was the Court church of New York. From that day to this, how great the change! How complete the exodus of that class which here displayed the signals of their wealth and quality! How overwhelming the invasion of business, slowly driving the residents away, till now the congregation of St. John's comes for the most part from above Canal Street, and the tide, receding, ebbs daily further and further away.
